I. Introduction

1. In its resolution 51/65 of 12 December 1996 on violence against women migrant workers, the General Assembly, recalling all previous resolutions on violence against women migrant workers that had been adopted by the Assembly, the Commission on the Status of Women and the Commission on Human Rights, affirmed the pronouncements of various recent world conferences with respect to women migrant workers, noted the holding of the expert group meeting on violence against women migrant workers held at Manila in May 1996, and took note of resolution 1996/12 of the Subcommission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities concerning, inter alia, women migrant workers.

2. The General Assembly made a number of recommendations in resolution 51/65 for action by Member States and the United Nations system, and invited Member States, as well as relevant international organizations, to provide their views and comments to the Secretary-General on the issue of indicators as a basis for addressing the situation of women migrant workers, as contained in the report of the Secretary-General (A/51/325). The Assembly also invited the Administrative Committee on Coordination, within its mandate, to examine how to improve coordination within the United Nations system on the question of violence against women migrant workers. It furthermore requested the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session on the implementation of the resolution, including the reports received from all authorities and bodies in the United Nations system, Member States, intergovernmental organizations and other concerned bodies, with "due regard for possible measures to improve reporting procedure".

3. In 1998, the Commission on the Status of Women will review four critical areas of concern identified in the Beijing Platform for Action. Among these critical areas to be reviewed is violence against women. Attention is drawn to the definition of violence against women contained in article 1 of the Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women (General Assembly resolution 48/104): "[A]ny act of gender-based violence that results in, or is likely to result in, physical, sexual or psychological harm and suffering to women, including threats of such acts, coercion or arbitrary deprivation of liberty, whether occurring in public or in private life."

4. The present report describes the steps that have been taken to implement resolution 51/65, based on reports received from Member States,¹ authorities and bodies within the United Nations system,² and intergovernmental organizations. Also contained in the report are views and comments on the issue of indicators as a basis for addressing the situation of women migrant workers, as contained in the report of the Secretary-General (A/51/325).

II. Measures introduced by Member States to address violence against migrant women workers

5. As of 11 September 1997, 22 Member States had responded to the Secretary-General's request for information on the implementation of General Assembly resolution 51/65.

A. Legal measures

1. International obligations

6. Several Member States noted that they were States parties to international treaties regulating the treatment of workers generally and migrant workers in particular. For example, one Member State³ noted that it was a party to International Labour Organization (ILO) Convention No. 100, providing for equal pay for equal work. Others⁴ indicated that they were States parties to the Slavery Convention, the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, the Conventions on the abolition of forced or obligatory labour and on the abolition of forced labour, and the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of their Families.

2. Constitutional provisions

7. A number of countries⁵ noted that their national constitutions contained a non-discrimination clause prohibiting, inter alia, discrimination on the basis of sex. Others noted that rights guaranteed in their national Constitutions were guaranteed to everyone in the country, including permanent residents and temporary foreign workers, including with respect to the right to work,⁶ although certain exceptions might apply with respect to electoral and other rights.⁷

3. Measures to address violence against women

8. A number of countries⁸ indicated that the legal provisions applicable to violence against women generally applied not only to violence against nationals, but also to women migrant workers. Such provisions sometimes addressed psychological, as well as physical or sexual violence.⁹ A number of respondents indicated that they had,¹⁰ or were preparing,¹¹ laws to protect workers against sexual harassment in the workplace. The existence of a national plan to prevent, punish and eradicate all forms of violence against women was also reported by one country.¹²

9. Several countries reported on the introduction of specific laws to address violence within the family to which women migrant workers, as well as nationals, have access. One Member State reported that its Protection against Violence Within the Family Act, which entered into force on 1 May 1997, enabled the police to order the offender to leave and remain away from the home and provided for increased cooperation between the police and the courts and for the creation of specific protection schemes for victims of violence.¹³ It also noted that an amendment to its Civil Code allowed victims of sexual crimes to claim damages. Similar measures were reported by other States, some of which had also introduced comprehensive police and social work training.¹⁴

4. Labour provisions

10. Several countries¹⁵ reported that their domestic labour provisions prohibited discrimination on the basis of sex and that no distinction was made between male and female workers. A number of respondents¹⁶ indicated that no distinction was drawn between national and foreign workers insofar as the protection afforded by labour laws was concerned. Others¹⁷ indicated that specific provisions in the national labour codes prohibited placing migrant workers in worse working conditions than those of nationals. Some¹⁸ also noted that national laws provided specific protection for employees from acts of violence by employers or fellow employees. Several respondents indicated that special provisions had been enacted with respect to specific categories of migrant workers. One State¹⁹ reported that legislative amendments had been made to allow for “proper control over foreign entertainers”, while another²⁰ noted that women migrant workers in the private sector were provided with the same rights as male migrant workers, as well as additional benefits, such as maternity leave and child protection. Another State²¹ drew attention to its Plan of Equal Opportunities for Women Workers which, although not yet implemented, contained specific recommendations relating to migrant women workers, while another²² noted its National Programme on the Protection of Migrants, which although not addressing women exclusively, did elaborate measures for the protection of migrant workers generally.

5. Regulation of employment agencies

11. One Member State²³ indicated that legislation governed the organization of agencies for the recruitment of domestic workers, while the same Member State also reported that it had introduced regulations for employment agencies and set out rules governing the issue of permits to agencies for the employment of servants.²⁴ It had also established a Department of Domestic Service to study cases involving the procurement of migrant workers and to ensure that domestic service procurement agencies had the correct information and data on would-be migrant workers. A special department to investigate cases involving domestic employees had also been established with the aim of resolving disputes between employer and employee mutually or through the judicial process or in cooperation with the employee's embassy or consulate. Another Member State²⁵ reported that there was a process to denounce “employment agencies” that promise women and girls domestic employment, but placed them in prostitution.

12. Another Member State,²⁶ the nationals of which are extensively involved in labour migration, as well as migration for the purposes of marriage, has implemented strict qualifications for the regulation of agencies and employers of their nationals who work as performing artists. These establish a set of qualifications for legitimate performing artists, pre-qualification of principals/sponsors, pre-qualification of performance venues and the establishment of welfare and monitoring centres to strengthen protection for artists. All parties to the contract of employment of migrant workers must declare the real terms and conditions with respect to the workers employment.²⁷ This Member State has also established a watch list or blacklist of foreign principals and employers who are prohibited, because of default in contractual obligations or grave misconduct, from participating in the overseas employment programme.

13. The same Member State has also introduced stringent administrative measures to govern the selection of destination countries based on the laws of the host country with regard to foreign workers and the existence of multilateral and bilateral agreements.²⁸ It may also recommend the suspension of deployment or restriction of markets or skills based on the situation of peace and order in the host country and the advice of its Department of Foreign Affairs. It has also emphasized those occupations that are non-vulnerable and aims to phase out occupations that expose women to abuse and exploitation.

6. Migration regulation

14. One Member State²⁹ reported on legal measures introduced to address illegal trafficking in migrants, which includes provisions in the Federal Law against Organized Crime, setting out sanctions for those who organize illegal immigration. This Member State also has introduced legal regulations for immigration procedures and punishes those who endanger the health, well-being or lives of migrants.³⁰ Another State³¹ described legislation providing sanctions relating to illegal employment by foreigners and drew attention to legislation criminalizing illegal trafficking in migrants and the promotion of clandestine immigration.

B. Other measures

1. Counselling and welfare

15. One country³² reported that counselling, with the assistance of interpreters, for foreigners on human rights issues was available through the Legal Affairs and District Legal Affairs Bureaux. Another³³ noted that the Minister of Labour and her technical advisers made annual visits to all sites where women migrant workers were employed.

16. Another country³⁴ reported that an Under-Secretary of State had been appointed to oversee the condition of the country's nationals who were employed abroad and had been given the specific mandate of entering into dialogue with countries receiving such nationals. The same country had also established a specific foundation which was charged with oversight of the welfare of nationals working abroad and their families. Another country³⁵ reported on the establishment and management of 21 workers resource centres attached to embassies and consulates in host countries. The centres offered workers counselling and legal services, conciliation of disputes and interpretation services during court hearings; procurement of medical and hospitalization services; information and orientation programmes for overseas workers and human resources development, including skills training and upgrading. The same country also reported that repatriation services for stranded, detained, maltreated and sick workers were implemented by the embassies/consulates of that country in collaboration with the overseas labour corps and the Office of Workers' Welfare and Administration. Another Member State³⁶ reported that its embassies abroad were charged with oversight of the welfare of migrant workers and kept a register of cases. The same Member State also noted that the Church, through its pastoral activities with respect to migrants, was also involved in the welfare of migrant workers. Another Member State³⁷ drew attention to its programme to promote the interests of migrant women workers and the Forum for the Social Integration of Immigrants which had been established to facilitate consultation and dialogue between public administration, civil society and migrants' associations. In addition, the Member State indicated that aid, including subsidies, was available for measures to facilitate the integration of immigrants and to address emergency situations.

17. Another Member State³⁸ drew attention to the Memorandum relating to consular protection of Mexican and American citizens signed on 7 May 1996, which ensured that any persons detained by migration authorities were informed of their rights and legal options, including their right to contact their consular representative, and facilitated communication between consular representatives and citizens. The Memorandum provides that both Governments will attempt to ensure that consular representatives are informed of cases that involve the detention of minors and pregnant women. Bilateral arrangements entered into between this Member State and others also govern repatriation, where the Member State seeks to ensure that repatriation does not bring about the separation of families and is accompanied by measures to ensure that women receive non-discriminatory treatment and are not subjected to conditions which endanger their physical well being.

18. The same Member State³⁹ noted its National Programme of Migratory Supervision, which oversees activities and procedures of inspection and migratory controls, and establishes protection groups for migrants with a mandate to combat criminality and to protect the human rights of migrants in frontier areas. It noted that the protection groups coordinated with both public and private social assistance bodies. The Member State also drew attention to the fact that its National Institute for Migration, the National Commission on Human Rights and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees had authorized civil servants whose work involved migration to give assistance to migrant women workers who were the victims of violent acts. A Directorate for the Protection of Migrants had been established by the Institute of Migration to address the issue.

2. Education

19. Several countries reported on education measures for potential migrant women workers. One country⁴⁰ had introduced a mandatory module on migration in the secondary level curriculum in order to equip entrants into the labour force with information for decisions with respect to work and work-site preferences. The same country had also put in place nationwide pre-employment seminars, organized in conjunction with civil society, for the grass roots, as well as pre-departure orientation seminars for women in vulnerable occupations such as domestic service and entertainment. The seminars aimed to inform participants about the culture and mores of the host country. In addition, age and literacy requirements had been established for women migrant workers in vulnerable occupations, with literacy requirements, including in the use of English, having been established for domestic helpers and female entertainers.

20. The same country noted that its President had declared 1997 as Anti Migrant Trafficking Year and that concerned government agencies, as well as the national Airline Operators Council had signed a memorandum of agreement to enhance the cooperation of all agencies in the prevention of the existence and/or proliferation of illegal recruiters providing escort services at international airports and seaports.

21. Another Member State⁴¹ drew attention to a "Guide to the Human Rights of Migrants", a collaborative venture of the National Institute of Migration and the National Commission on Human Rights, while still another Member State⁴² noted that it planned to publish a guide on the rights of and resources available to migrant women workers in Arabic, English and Spanish, the languages most commonly used by migrant women workers.

C. Reintegration

22. One country reported on measures to ensure the reintegration of migrant women workers on their return. It indicated that such programmes were offered by the Workers Resource Centres in the host country and provided training courses and information on employment and livelihood opportunities in the workers' country of origin. In addition, skills training and upgrading courses were available in the country of origin, as were employment placement and referral services and livelihood loan referrals and skills-for-employment scholarship baccalaureate courses.

D. Bilateral and regional measures

23. Some countries had concluded bilateral agreements with other countries relating to the rights of foreign workers. For example, the Russian Federation had concluded bilateral agreements with China, Viet Nam and Germany on principles governing the assignment and hiring of foreign workers. Morocco had bilateral agreements with countries, including Belgium, France and Germany, which aim to ensure equal treatment for Moroccan workers in those countries. Mexico had concluded a number of bilateral arrangements with respect to migrant workers, including the Combined Declaration on Migration by the Presidents of the United States of America and Mexico, adopted on 6 May 1997. The Declaration expressed the commitment of both countries to the protection of the rights of migrants and the promotion of effective prosecution of complaints by migrants. Paraguay reported on discussions with Argentina with regard to preparation of a Convention on Migration.

24. One Member State⁴³ noted the conclusions of the Second Regional Conference on Migration, which was held on 13 and 14 March 1997 in Panama. The Conference adopted an Action Plan containing a specific section on the human rights of migrants touching on the human rights of migrant women workers, and established a Regional Consulting Group on Migration and a Coordinating Commission to coordinate follow-up to the Action Plan and exchange of information.

III. Views and comments on the issue of indicators

25. In paragraph 9 of resolution 51/65 the General Assembly invited Member States, as well as relevant international organizations, to provide their views and comments to the Secretary-General on the issue of indicators as a basis for addressing the situation of women migrant workers, as set forth in the report of the Secretary-General (A/51/325, annex, paras. 44 and 45).

26. Five Member States⁴⁴ provided comments with regard to the issue of indicators.

27. One country⁴⁵ drew attention to paragraph 36 of the annex to the Secretary-General's report which contains the conclusions and recommendations of the expert group meeting held at Manila, noting that discrepancies in data collection on violence against women migrant workers could not be resolved without addressing the larger issue of discrepancies in all migration statistics and stressing the importance of implementation of the recent work of the 1997 United Nations Statistical Commission contained in the Draft Revised Recommendations on Statistics of International Migration.⁴⁶ Reference was made to Economic and Social Council resolution 1997/2 of 18 July 1997 on international migration and development, adopted on the recommendation of the Commission on Population and Development, in which the Council urged the Statistics and Population divisions of the United Nations Secretariat, along with the regional commissions and other relevant United Nations and intergovernmental organizations and Governments providing technical assistance in statistics, to collaborate in the dissemination of the recommendations referred to above and to provide, at the request of Governments, technical assistance in implementing them. It was suggested that implementation of those recommendations would go a long way towards overcoming the discrepancies in migration statistics.

28. It was suggested that “inadequate legal sanctions against violence against women, or inadequate enforcement of existing legislation” could be added to the list of indicators of vulnerability contained in paragraph 45 of the annex to the Secretary-General’s report.

29. Another Member State⁴⁷ expressed its strong support for the elaboration of a set of indicators that could be used as a basis for addressing the situation of violence against women migrant workers to enable Governments to clearly assess and determine the exact nature, duration and degree of violence experienced by women migrant workers in the sending and receiving countries and in transit. It was considered that the use of indicators would ultimately make it possible for both sending and receiving countries to discuss, agree on and implement policies, strategies and measures towards bilateral, regional and multilateral cooperation and collaboration. It was also pointed out that a great number of women who had migrated abroad in search of work had done so through betrothal or marriage to citizens or nationals of the host country. That method of entry into the host country had made them vulnerable to exploitation and abuse, both at home and at work. The concerns of immigrant fiancées/spouses should thus be reflected in the indicators.

30. The same Member State supported the determination of indicators on situations that rendered women migrant workers vulnerable to violence and suggested revisions to the set of indicators drawn up by the United Nations expert group meeting⁴⁸ and reflected in the Secretary-General’s report (ibid.).

31. Another Member State⁴⁹ agreed with the importance of the participation of all government organs that maintained registers on migrant populations and the human rights of women and minors in collating the information related to violence and the vulnerability and general characteristics of migrant women workers. The Member State noted that its National Commission on Human Rights undertook various monitoring efforts in that regard, in collaboration with human rights institutions working outside its borders, so that concrete data and statistics could be available to be used in the detection of the most important violations of the human rights of migrant workers seeking to cross its borders. It has established coordination with human rights commissions and information exchange mechanisms between embassies and consulates in the region and non-governmental organizations in order to collect concrete data and statistics with respect to migration. A study has been initiated to analyse demographic and socio-economic indicators on women in areas from which migration is common.

32. Another Member State⁵⁰ considered that the issue of indicators on violence against women migrant workers was complex and sensitive. It noted that before the issue of indicators could be considered there was a need to agree on the definition of violence against women migrant workers. In that regard, some countries regarded any form of violation of women migrant workers’ rights as violence, which stretched the normal definition of violence to include economic exploitation, breach of contract, etc., and would lead to exaggeration. In the view of the Member State “violence” against women migrant workers should only cover physical violence. The issue of improving employment conditions should not be confused with violence. To address broad areas concerning women migrant workers as violence could dilute efforts to tackle the real issues.

33. It was also noted by the same Member State that, given the diversity of the domestic conditions of each receiving country, it was impossible to come up with an international norm to address the issue of violence against women migrant workers. It was suggested that in the absence of such a norm the list of indicators was open to interpretation and this could lead to problems of compatibility and measurability. In addition, as many incidences of the situation of violence against women migrant workers were qualitative in nature, they did not lend themselves to quantitative measurements.

34. The Member State indicated that it was important to adopt a balanced approach to the situation of women migrant workers and that there was a need to look at the question of indicators from a broader perspective. For example, a set of indicators on the overall situation of women migrant workers that included other indicators could be used apart from those on violence against women migrant workers. While there was no doubt that cases of victimization of women migrant workers existed, positive indicators should also be included to determine the benefits accruing from migration. Positive indicators should include: (a) reasons women migrant workers extended or renewed their employment; (b) their motivation for staying in the countries of destination after completing one term; (c) net benefits, as perceived by women migrant workers; and (d) remittances received by the countries of origin.

35. The Member State also proposed that if the General Assembly considered it necessary to study the question of indicators further, it should establish an open-ended working group to study the question, reviewing the recommendations made by the United Nations Expert Group Meeting held at Manila.

36. On the issue of indicators, another Member State⁵¹ noted the comments in paragraph 42 of the annex to the Secretary-General's report, in particular that the issue of violence against women migrant workers should be seen in a wider context; that responsibility should be borne by sending and receiving countries; that overall net benefits accruing to many women migrant workers should be acknowledged; and that there was a need to acknowledge a differentiated approach to the issue, given the different domestic conditions prevailing in different countries. It was suggested that women migrant workers would gain greater protection and rights if the actions recommended in the annex to the Secretary-General's report were implemented. If the laws of every country were required to accord special status to women migrant workers, such status could result in receiving countries curbing or controlling the flow of foreign labour into their countries.

37. The Member State also noted that the Secretary-General's report categorized violence into economic exploitation, social/psychological violence, physical/sexual violence and violence resulting from operation of the legal system and pointed out that non-payment or delay in the payment of wages and/or violation of wages agreed to under contract had been highlighted as a common type of economic exploitation in receiving countries. Instances constituting breach of contract could be remedied through the operation of the Member State's domestic legal system and it was extremely rare for foreign workers to be working in the absence of a contract. Foreign workers should have the same access as the local population to the protection of the domestic Penal Code. In the view of the Member State, women migrant workers had access to representatives of their countries through their respective foreign missions and the level of assistance and/or support offered by those missions was a matter for the mission concerned.

IV. Actions taken by organizations of the United Nations system on the situation of women migrant workers

38. Since the fifty-first session of the General Assembly, a number of intergovernmental bodies and organizations of the United Nations system have undertaken further work on the subject. Their actions are reviewed below.

A. Commission on the Status of Women

39. At its forty-first session, the Commission on the Status of Women adopted resolution 41/4 on violence against women migrant workers. In addition to reiterating part of the text of General Assembly resolution 51/65 and noting the convening of the United Nations expert group meeting on violence against women migrant workers held at Manila in May 1996, the Commission decided to remain seized of the matter and requested the Secretary-General to take into account and to reflect in a "thematic report" to the Commission on the Status of Women at its forty-second session the various major findings and recommendations from all reports of the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly on the issue of violence against women migrant workers, in order for the Commission to make recommendations on the issue.⁵²

B. Commission on Human Rights

40. At its fifty-third session, the Commission on Human Rights adopted resolution 1997/13 of 3 April 1997 entitled "Violence against women migrant workers", in which it, inter alia, invited the States concerned to consider adopting appropriate legal measures against intermediaries who deliberately encouraged the clandestine movement of workers and exploited women migrant workers, and encouraged States to consider signing and ratifying or acceding to the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of their Families, which as at 16 July 1997, had 17 States parties. The Commission also requested the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, the Centre for Human Rights and the Special Rapporteur on violence against women, as well as all relevant bodies and programmes in the United Nations system, when addressing the issue of violence against women to give particular attention to the issue of violence perpetrated against women migrant workers. It furthermore invited the regional commissions and the regional offices of the International Labour Organization to examine ways and means, within their mandates, of dealing with concerns pertaining to women migrant workers and requested the Secretary-General to submit a comprehensive report to the Commission at its fifty-fourth session in 1998 on the implementation of the resolution.

1. Special Rapporteur on violence against women

41. In her report to the Commission on Human Rights at its fifty-third session,⁵³ the Special Rapporteur on violence against women focused on the issue of violence against women in the community, and within that broad topic addressed violence against women migrant workers. The Special Rapporteur affirmed that, owing to their double marginalization as women and as migrants, women migrant workers might easily find themselves in situations in which they were vulnerable to violence and abuse, especially since women migrant workers dominated the informal labour market of most countries, working as domestic, industrial or agricultural labourers, or within the service industry. She noted that many conditions which stimulated migration by women for work might also lead to women becoming victims of trafficking, so that trafficked women and voluntary women migrants might find themselves in comparable situations of exploitation, violence and abuse.

42. The Special Rapporteur stated that the unregulated and unprotected nature of informal labour translated into minimal or no legal protection for migrant women and this was compounded by women's social isolation. Mechanisms of support and assistance for migrant women in violent situations existed in some countries of destination, but were often inaccessible to women migrants because of their lack of physical mobility, language skills or knowledge that those organizations existed. Local embassies did not have the facilities or programmes to meet the needs of women migrant workers who were forced to seek protection from violence at the hands of their employer. The Special Rapporteur noted that the pervasive situation of violence against migrant women had stimulated some countries of origin to implement protective policies, many of which, however, might actually harm women migrant workers and increase their vulnerability to exploitation. In that regard, she noted that as a result of one country's ban on solo foreign labour migration by women, recruitment agents arranged sham marriages with men who escorted the women to their employers outside the country.⁵⁴

43. In her recommendations to the Commission on Human Rights, the Special Rapporteur requested, countries of origin and countries of destination to establish migrant worker desks at their embassies/consulates. Countries of destination should implement orientation programmes for migrant workers which should be available immediately upon arrival. Countries of destination were also called upon to prosecute abusive employers and to ensure that shelters and counselling services were available for women migrant workers who were victims of violence.

2. Subcommittee on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities

44. At its forty-eighth session in 1996, the Subcommittee adopted resolution 1996/10 on migrant workers. It also adopted resolution 1996/12 on the report of the working group on contemporary forms of slavery which, inter alia dealt with migrant workers. The position of migrant workers was also discussed during the Subcommittee's forty-ninth session under agenda item 3, "Comprehensive examination of thematic issues relating to the elimination of racial discrimination".⁵⁵

3. Working Group on Contemporary Forms of Slavery

45. The Working Group on Contemporary Forms of Slavery of the Subcommittee on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities continued to discuss the issue of migrant workers and at its twenty-second session. In examining the issue, the Working Group paid special attention to the question of domestic workers, in particular young girls, and decided, on the recommendation of several non-governmental organizations, to give priority to the consideration of the question of domestic and migrant workers at its next session.⁵⁶

C. Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice

46. At its sixth session, in 1997, the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice adopted draft resolution III on crime prevention and criminal justice measures to eliminate violence against women,⁵⁷ in which it, inter alia, adopted the Model Strategies and Practical Measures on the Elimination of Violence against Women in the Field of Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice as a model of guidelines to be used by Governments in their efforts to address, within the criminal justice system, the various manifestations of violence against women. Although draft resolution III and the Model Strategies do not address the issue of violence against women migrant workers specifically, the measures suggested are likely to enhance efforts to protect the rights of women migrant workers.

D. Inter–Agency Committee on Women and Gender Equality

47. The Inter–Agency Committee on Women and Gender Equality, established in 1996, has been entrusted with supporting the Administrative Committee on Coordination in system-wide coordination in the implementation of the Beijing Platform for Action and with respect to gender mainstreaming.

48. A system-wide medium–term plan for the advancement of women 1996–2001 has been elaborated.⁵⁸ The mid-term review of the plan will be conducted by the Commission on the Status of Women and the Economic and Social Council in 1998. In the preparation of the report, the question of violence against women, including against women migrant workers, will be reviewed. The Inter–Agency Committee is also seized of the issue of violence against women and coordination of efforts of United Nations bodies and agencies in this regard.

V. Conclusions

49. Responses from Member States suggest that the question of violence against women migrant workers is an issue which is just emerging. Although responses do suggest that efforts have been applied to address discrimination against women and to introduce measures to confront violence against women generally in several Member States, few States have adopted measures to combat the specific issue of violence against women migrant workers. Again, although measures have been introduced to ameliorate the situation of migrant workers generally, few have been specifically directed at women migrant workers. It is clear that more extensive information and data are required on the situation of women migrant workers so that concrete strategies can be introduced. In this regard, it is important to note that the analysis of national action plans by the Commission on the Status of Women will broaden the information base against which strategies can be developed. It is clear, however, from responses from Governments that the issue of violence against migrant women workers is emerging as a serious concern, and as further data become available the formulation of appropriate measures will be required.
