Violations of the Right to Peaceful Assembly, Freedom of Opinion and Expression in Iraq¹ *

Since the beginning of 2014, human rights violations by the Iraqi authorities became more serious, systematic and widespread in regards especially to right to peaceful assembly, freedom of opinion and expression. In blatant violation of the international standards the government responded to peaceful protests with excessive and inadequate use of force, including administrative obstacles and the use of military force, politically motivated threats and attacks against media institutions and those journalists who report on protests or advocate human rights.

The ruthless military attacks against civilian demonstrators by the government forces are in serious violation of all fundamental human rights and must immediately be put to an end.

Peaceful protests in Iraq and the Iraqi government's response

Iraq has been the scene of intensive peaceful demonstrations during 2010-2014. Despite the existing international standards setting forth freedom of assembly and expression, the government has responded to peaceful protests with excessive use of force. Though, a joint committee was established by the government in early 2013 with a mandate to investigate the demonstrators' demands; however, it failed to render any result up to this day. In August 2013, the Interior Ministry officials refused to issue permits for two concurrent groups organising demonstrations, without providing them a reason. Moreover, media organisations and journalists who report on protests or advocated human rights are regularly further targets of politically motivated threats and attacks.

Although Article 38 (3) of the Iraqi constitution guarantees the right to freedom of assembly and demonstrations, the Ministry of Interior has yet to approve every request for any planned peaceful demonstration. In August 2013, the Ministry of Interior stated that he was aware of the planned peaceful demonstration; however, he demanded the postponement while warning the organisers of possible "terrorist attacks" and the importance of national security. This pretext of the alleged terrorist attacks has been continuously used to postpone, cancel or prohibit demonstrations as well as arbitrarily detain protesters and convict them on "terrorist charges". This is an important issue which is directly linked to the Anti-Terrorism Law No.13 of 2005. This law is the main pretext for targeting and restricting peaceful protests.

The peaceful protests demanded the provision of basic services and the end of corruption and human rights violations. In general, the demonstrations were in response to an increased frustration with the deteriorating conditions that Iraqis are forced to endure on a daily basis. The protests started through the discovery of the ill-treatment of female prisoners.

Attacks on Demonstrations

Throughout Iraq people were enraged at the Maliki government because his security forces, still heavily staffed by members of various militias, were killing or detaining their compatriots from the region, as well as across much of Baghdad. As of December 2012, angry protesters in Anbar, Nineveh, Ta'mim, Salaheldin, Diyla, and other places, took to the streets every Friday, holding signs that read, "We demand an end to checkpoints surrounding our cities", "We demand they end their unlawful home raids and detentions", "We demand an end to federalism and gangsters and secret prisons!"²

In January of 2013, the Iraqi army officers opened fire on peaceful demonstrators in Mosul. The Governor of Nineveh province confirmed that security forces shot at demonstrators in an attempt to disperse them. Civilians who simply attempted to reach the peaceful protests in Mosul were pursued and targeted by army officers.³ On 25 January 2013, a peaceful sit-in protest in Fallujah was interrupted by open fire from army forces killing a total of 9 and injuring over 60 additional civilians. Witnesses claim that the security forces fired directly at the peaceful protesters.

One of the most tragic cases of the government's restrictions on these fundamental rights of freedom of assembly was seen in April 2013 in Al-Hawija, during which over 200 protesters were killed, wounded or arrested. Over a period of several days in April 2013, around 4000 peaceful demonstrators protested against the government's repeated disrespect for human rights in the Hawija/ Ta'mim (Kirkuk) province in Iraq. At a certain point during the demonstrations, the protesters found themselves surrounded by armed governmental troops that prevented all access to food, water and medical aid. Access to all forms of media including journalists and news casters were also prevented and their equipment confiscated. The army and militias stormed the area and attacked the peaceful protesters who were authorised by the mayor of Kirkuk to hold these demonstrations.⁴

. Instead of answering to the justified demands of demonstrators and improving its human rights record the measures undertaken by the government of Iraq became increasingly draconian.

Operation in the province of Anbar

In December 2013, the army troops launched an operation in the province of Anbar, where some Al-Qaeda camps are said to be located in the desert. Based on the fact that the majority of the population in the area has always been as much in the opposition to al-Qaeda as they had been against the occupation, several tribe leaders expressed their willingness to support this fight against the notorious terrorist organisation. Suddenly the army moved close to the cities and turned against the protesters, claiming that they were not just a place for recruiting terrorist but for sheltering them too,⁵ a claim that was totally rejected by the residents, who been assured that there are no foreigners involved in the uprisings and offered that the government troupes may come into the protest camps and search without being harassed.

Nevertheless on December 28, 2013 the situation escalated with the violent arrested of a senior MP from Al-Anbar, and he is the Chair of the Iraqi Parliament's Economics committee – Dr Ahmad Alwani. An assault force of 50 armored vehicles, helicopter gunships and hundreds of heavily armed troops killed 9 members of his family and arrested him and over 150 of his staff on baseless charges of terrorism. Dr Alwani has been a key critic of Maliki and of Iranian meddling in Iraq.

On the 30th of December 2013 the protest camps were stormed. When no terrorists were found it was casually suggested that in the terrorists had probably escaped. Such rhetoric is typical for the current Iraqi government, which commonly labels all its opposition as terrorists, claiming that they are active members of Al Qaeda. This is although those Al Qaeda fighters who had indeed infiltrated Ramadi had quickly been driven out by the locals themselves.

In the wake of January 2, 2014 then the 600.000 residents of Fallujah found themselves encircled by government forces. This time it was claimed that Al Qaeda and ISIL had taken over the city. Indeed some people wearing such badges were seen, who set police stations on fire and encountered strong resistance from the local residents, who drove them out. In this context, as a side note, it needs to be mentioned that contrary to what would have to be expected if these people had been affiliated to extremist groups witnesses testified that these persons had come with modern military vehicles and left the city undisturbed despite the siege of the governmental army.

During the days following these incidents the residents of Fallujah then publicly declared several times that the city had not been taken over by terrorist, yet the official rhetoric by the Iraqi government did not change. According to local estimation and UN figures the total number of displaced persons stand at around 450.000. Deaths in Anbar Province are now being excluded from Iraq government statistics.⁶ According to the hospital in Fallujah the civilian casualties since the beginning of 2014 until May is about 1,296 wounded and 295 killed. These figures are not exclusive as there is much causality which can't be reported to the hospital due to the security situation. Normal services such as clean water, constant electricity are non-existent. Given the power interruptions and tense situation, the full numbers are incomplete.

Doctors, residents and NGO workers in Fallujah are accusing the Iraqi government of "war crimes" and "crimes against humanity" that have occurred as a result of its ongoing attack on the city. "Many houses and have been attacked, and many civilians killed and injured," one doctor said. "Many people have been killed before they could reach the hospital, which has also been targeted by Maliki's army." Several doctors were prevented from entering the city. "What is happening in Fallujah is a war crime," the doctor further explained. "Believe me that there have never been any official nor military targets attacked by Maliki's army. Civilians are the only target."⁷

Recommendations

- The UN and the Human Rights Council to ensure that all human rights violations committed in Iraq since 2003 to be investigated by an international independent body;
- The reinstatement of the position of a Special Rapporteur for Iraq.
- The Special Rapporteur on the Rights to Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association and on the Freedom of Opinion to submit a detailed report to the HRC on respective violations;
- To halt any military aid to the Iraqi government until the human rights investigation by an independent body is finalised.
