We have the honour of addressing Your Excellency, as Women Ministers of Foreign Affairs from different Member States of the United Nations. We are committed to promote the well-being and the rights of women at both the national and international level. To this end, we have met during the 58th session of the United Nations General Assembly to discuss the issue of "Women and Migration" which we consider to be topical and of special interest.

As Your Excellency is aware, migration is a complex phenomenon affecting countries of origin, transit and destination. It calls for concerted international policies that would address the political, economic, legal, social, cultural, human rights and humanitarian as well as gender aspects. The importance of managing orderly migration and combating irregular migration resulting in the exploitation and abuse of women has to be emphasized by raising public awareness at the international level.

During the past decades, the number of migrant women has increased steadily, enabling those women in some cases to gain personal experience and economic independence and allowing them to contribute to the subsistence of their families in their country of origin.

However, migrant women are often confronted with serious threats to their physical and moral integrity or even their lives, especially in circumstances of irregular migration. Irregular migration may expose women to falling pray to traffickers, entailing sexual exploitation, social slavery such as subjugation, discrimination and isolation in countries of origin, transit and destiny.

In addition, we attribute utmost importance to effectively and efficiently combating trafficking in women and children and to address it as a major manifestation of gender inequality in the current era of globalization. We are seriously concerned about the increasing number of women and children trafficked like commodities for sexual, domestic and labour exploitation as underlined in your note to the twelfth session of the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice and in accordance with your report, Mr. Secretary-General, on the implementation of the Millennium Declaration.

We consider it essential for the United Nations, to continue to promote a gender-sensitive debate on migration and trafficking and to take the necessary actions to address specific aspects of women migration in general and trafficking in women in particular. Such actions should aim at reducing vulnerability to migratory risks, and at the same time at facilitating social integration of migrant women into the country of destination. In order to strengthen efforts to combat trafficking and protect migrant women, we should all strive to intensify cooperation within the United Nations system, with relevant regional organizations and with other relevant actors in the field.

In consequence, we would like to invite all Member States to continue to address the issue of women and migration, including a gender perspective in this debate, as well as to take all necessary actions to ensure we remain seized with this matter during the fifty-eighth session of the General Assembly.
