I. INTRODUCTION

1. During its forty-eighth session, the Commission on Human Rights had before it the report on the situation of human rights in Cuba prepared by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Rafael Rivas Posada, pursuant to the mandate conferred by Commission resolution 1991/68 (E/CN.4/1992/27 and Corr.1). At the same session, the Commission adopted resolution 1992/61 of 3 March 1992 entitled "Situation of human rights in Cuba". In paragraph 6 of that resolution, the Commission requested its Chairman to designate the Special Representative as its Special Rapporteur to review and report on the situation of human rights in Cuba. In paragraph 9 of the resolution, the Commission requested the Special Rapporteur to carry out his mandate, bearing in mind the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and to report to the Commission at its forty-ninth session on the results of his endeavours under the same agenda item, and to submit an interim report to the General Assembly at its forty-seventh session.

2. In a letter dated 18 March 1992, the Special Representative, Mr. Rivas Posada, informed the Centre for Human Rights in Geneva of his decision not to accept the designation of special rapporteur given to him in the above-mentioned resolution.

3. In a letter dated 10 April 1992, the Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights at its forty-eighth session informed the Under-Secretary-General for Human Rights that, as Mr. Rivas Posada was no longer able to continue his mandate, the designation of a special rapporteur could not be accomplished until another person had been designated to replace Mr. Rivas Posada. The Chairman of the Commission therefore invited the Secretary-General to appoint a special representative who would subsequently be designated as the Commission's special rapporteur. In the same letter, the Chairman, at the request of the Bureau of the Commission, asked for legal advice on the interpretation of paragraph 6 of Commission resolution 1992/61.

4. In a note verbale dated 27 April 1992 from the Permanent Representative of Cuba to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General (see annex I), and a note dated 4 May 1992 from the Permanent Mission to the United Nations Office at Geneva, addressed to the Under-Secretary-General for Human Rights, the Government of Cuba, in the light of the decision taken by Mr. Rivas Posada, transmitted its interpretation of resolution 1992/61 and of paragraph 6 in particular. The second note verbale stated, inter alia:

"...the Chairman of the Commission at its forty-eighth session has no mandate to take it upon himself to designate a person other than Mr. Rafael Rivas Posada as Special Rapporteur ... since the wording of operative paragraph 6 is clear, precise and does not allow for the designation of another person ...

"Similarly, the Secretary-General of the United Nations lacks the power to designate another special representative to replace Mr. Rafael Rivas Posada since ... this is not a case of the Special Rapporteur having relinquished his functions or died; quite the contrary, Mr. Rivas Posada, Special Representative, took up and completed the mandate conferred under Commission resolution 1991/68 and Economic and Social Council decision 1991/252; he did not accept the designation of Special Rapporteur given to him in operative paragraph 6 of resolution 1992/61.

"For all the foregoing reasons, it would be necessary to wait until the forty-ninth session of the Commission before considering this issue, since a specific decision from the Commission is needed in order to amend the wording of operative paragraph 6 of resolution 1992/61 ..."

5. On 30 April 1992 the Under-Secretary-General for Legal Affairs transmitted to the Under-Secretary-General for Human Rights the legal opinion requested (see annex II), which reads, in part, as follows:

"Nothing in the resolution indicates that its object and purpose is limited to Mr. Rivas Posada. It does not refer to him by name. No provision of any of the relevant Commission decisions of which we are aware refers by name to the individual who had been designated 'Special Representative'. It is the usual practice in the United Nations to consider 'Special Representatives' or 'Special Rapporteurs' as organs of the body establishing them, in this case the Commission on Human Rights. Absent a different intention expressed by the body establishing the post, the resignation or death of the person holding the post does not, in and of itself, end the mandate. Rather, a new appointment is normally made so that the work can continue in fulfilment of the particular mandate, usually in the same manner as prescribed for the initial appointment."

6. The Economic and Social Council, in its decision 1992/236 of 20 July 1992, endorsed Commission resolution 1992/61.

7. On the basis of the foregoing, the Secretary-General decided to appoint Mr. Carl-Johan Groth, of Swedish nationality, as his Special Representative for Cuba replacing Mr. Rivas Posada and, on 31 August 1992, the Chairman of the Commission designated Mr. Groth as Special Rapporteur.

8. As provided in Commission resolution 1992/61, the Special Rapporteur submitted an interim report to the General Assembly at its forty-seventh session (A/47/625), and on 18 December 1992 the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/139, entitled "Situation of human rights in Cuba", whereby it decided to continue consideration of that item at its forty-eighth session. The present report is basically an update of the interim report and, as such, seeks to make an analysis of the most pressing problems which Cuba faces at present in the field of human rights, in so far as the Special Rapporteur was able to assess them in the light of the information received.

9. Pursuant to the mandate conferred on him, the Special Rapporteur took into consideration information from a wide variety of sources and expressed his willingness to receive any person or group wishing to meet him. During one of his visits to the United Nations Centre for Human Rights in Geneva, he talked with representatives of the non-governmental organizations, American Association of Jurists, International League for the Rights and Liberation of Peoples and Latin American Federation of Associations of Relatives of Disappeared Detainees. He also went to New York from 28 to 30 September 1992, where he had the opportunity to meet individuals and representatives of the following organizations and groups active on the subject of human rights in Cuba and operating in the United States of America, mainly in New York and Miami: the Cuban Committee for Human Rights, the Committee to Support the Human Rights Movement in Cuba, the Centre for Human Rights, the Coordinating Body for Human Rights Organizations in Cuba, the World Federation of Former Cuban Political Prisoners, the Cuban Democratic Coalition, the Cuban Christian Democratic Party, Freedom House, the Valladares Foundation and Americas Watch. Subsequently, during his visit to New York in November 1992 for the presentation of his interim report to the General Assembly, the Special Rapporteur met representatives of the Liberation Christian Movement and the Puebla Institute. The Special Rapporteur also visited Madrid on 13 and 14 October where he had occasion to meet Cuban citizens in exile and representatives of the Cuban Committee for Human Rights in Spain and the Association for Continental Peace (ASOPAZCO). In addition to those mentioned, other organizations, such as Amnesty International (International Secretariat), the Information Bureau of the Cuban Human Rights Movement, based in Miami, and the Geneva Initiative on Psychiatry, provided the Special Rapporteur with valuable information.

II. COOPERATION OF THE GOVERNMENT OF CUBA WITH THE SPECIAL RAPPORTEUR AND OTHER PROCEDURES OF THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

10. A few days after his appointment, the Special Rapporteur addressed a letter to the Permanent Representative of Cuba to the United Nations Office at Geneva requesting the cooperation of the Government of Cuba in carrying out his mandate and the opportunity to visit the country. To date, the reply of the Government of Cuba to his request has been negative, having regard to its intention to reject resolution 1992/61, as repeatedly stated in the Commission on Human Rights, the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly.

11. For its part, in its resolution 47/139, the General Assembly made an appeal to the Government of Cuba to cooperate with the Special Rapporteur by granting him access to the country in order to establish contacts with the Government and citizens of Cuba and thus fulfil the mandate entrusted to him.

12. In those same international forums, the Government has repeated its willingness to cooperate with all the other procedures established by the Commission on Human Rights which may be applied to any country, in particular the procedure established under Economic and Social Council resolution 1503 (XLVIII) and the thematic procedures. With regard to the latter, the Special Rapporteur has observed that the Special Rapporteur on summary or arbitrary executions, the Special Rapporteur on the question of torture and the Special Rapporteur on the question of religious intolerance, as well as the Working Group on Arbitrary Detention and the Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances, transmitted to the Government, particularly in 1991 and 1992, communications on complaints received within the framework of their respective mandates.

13. The Special Rapporteur on summary or arbitrary executions indicates in his report to the Commission (E/CN.4/1993/46) that during 1992 he transmitted to the Government of Cuba two urgent appeals on behalf of five persons sentenced to death. He also transmitted complaints about one person who had reportedly died in detention, three who had allegedly been shot dead by the police or the army and two who had reportedly received death threats. Concerning all those cases, the Government sent replies, which are reflected in paragraphs 224-226 of the above-mentioned report.

14. The Special Rapporteur on the question of torture indicates in his report (E/CN.4/1993/26, paras. 117-157) that he transmitted to the Government 17 cases of detainees in the Combinado del Este prison and 11 other prisons in the country, who had allegedly been ill-treated in 1991 or had been denied medical attention. Again, the Government sent replies regarding all of them.

15. The Special Rapporteur on the question of religious intolerance includes in his report (E/CN.4/1993/62, para. 24) the reply sent by the Government regarding 12 cases transmitted to it by the Special Rapporteur in 1991.

16. The Working Group on Arbitrary Detention also addressed several communications to the Government in 1991 and 1992. In its report to the Commission on Human Rights at the current session (E/CN.4/1993/24), the Group reports on 69 decisions taken regarding the same number of cases transmitted to the Government. In 19 of them, the Group decided that the deprivation of liberty was arbitrary and 50 were filed because the persons in question had been released or because insufficient information was available.

17. Finally, the Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances transmitted to the Government, in 1992, the case of one person thought to have disappeared in 1990. Again, the Government forwarded a reply with respect to that case (E/CN.4/1993/25, paras. 188-189).

18. In the cases dealt with under the procedures referred to, which also appear in the present report because they occurred in 1992, the reply of the Government is also reflected in the report.

III. LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL FRAMEWORK

19. Cuba is a party to the following international human rights instruments: the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination; the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid; the International Convention against Apartheid in Sports; the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide; the Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity; the Convention on the Rights of the Child; the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women; the Convention on the Political Rights of Women; the Convention on the Nationality of Married Women; the Convention on Consent to Marriage, Minimum Age for Marriage and Registration of Marriages; the Slavery Convention; the Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade, and Institutions and Practices Similar to Slavery; and the Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others.

20. Provisions concerning the protection of human rights appear in the 1976 Constitution, which was amended by the National Assembly of People's Power in July 1992. Most of the articles on human rights are in chapter VII, entitled "Fundamental rights, duties and guarantees" (arts. 45-66), article 62 of which provides:

"None of the freedoms which are recognized for citizens can be exercised contrary to what is established in the Constitution and the law, or contrary to the existence and objectives of the socialist State, or contrary to the decision of the Cuban people to build socialism and communism. Violations of this principle are punishable".

Furthermore, there are other chapters or specific articles of other chapters which also make reference to human rights. For example, chapter V relates to "Education and culture" and chapter VI to "Equality".

21. The reform of July 1992 introduced into the Constitution a new chapter VIII on the state of emergency. The sole provision of this chapter, article 67, provides as follows:

"In the event of the existence or imminence of a natural disaster or catastrophe or any other circumstances which by their nature, scale, or importance are detrimental to the internal order, the security of the country or the stability of the State, the President of the Council of State may declare a state of emergency in all or part of the national territory and make arrangements for the mobilization of the population during the period for which the state of emergency remains in effect.

"The manner in which the state of emergency is declared, its effects and its termination are governed by law. The fundamental rights and duties recognized by the Constitution, the exercise of which must be regulated differently during the period for which the state of emergency remains in effect are also determined by law."

22. Furthermore, article 93 (i) provides that, in the event of the declaration of a state of emergency, the President of the Council of State and Head of Government "shall report on his decision, as soon as the circumstances permit, to the National Assembly of People's Power or to the Council of State, if the former is unable to meet, for the appropriate legal purposes".

23. The Constitution also lays down the basic principles governing the territorial organization of the State and the functioning of the State organs, in particular the National, Provincial and Municipal Assemblies of People's Power. The constitutional reform changed the system for electing deputies to the National Assembly (a body which has constituent and legislative power) and to the Provincial Assemblies by establishing in article 71 that they shall be elected by the free, direct and secret vote of the electors. Before the reform, deputies were elected by the Municipal Assemblies of People's Power, which also elected the delegates to the Provincial Assemblies. In future, the latter will also be elected by popular vote (art. 135).

24. In accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, a New Electoral Law was adopted on 29 October 1992. Article 67 of this Law provides for the establishment of commissions of national, provincial and municipal candidatures, whose duties are to prepare and submit proposals for candidatures to the various assemblies. Under article 68, these commissions are composed of representatives of the various mass organizations, in other words, the Central Organization of Cuban workers, the Committees for the Defence of the Revolution, the Federation of Cuban Women, the National Association of Small Farmers, the Federation of University Students and the Federation of Secondary School Students. Elections to the Municipal Assemblies were held on 20 December 1992.

25. Chapter XIII of the Constitution lays down a series of basic principles on the functioning of the courts and of the Office of the Attorney-General of the Republic. In that regard, article 121 provides that "the courts constitute a system of State bodies, structured in such a way that they operate independently of any other such body and are hierarchically subordinate to the National Assembly of People's Power and the Council of State". The reform deleted from the Constitution the former article 123, which provided, inter alia, that the main objectives of the courts' activities were to maintain and strengthen socialist legality. According to the information received by the Special Rapporteur, this hierarchical subordination established in the Constitution itself is largely inconsistent with the Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary ^{1/} and, in the final analysis, raises serious doubts as to the ability of courts to ensure respect for the safeguards of due process established in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

IV. RIGHTS TO FREEDOM OF OPINION, ASSEMBLY AND ASSOCIATION

26. The Special Rapporteur has examined the extent to which these rights are protected in Cuban society in the light of the following provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights:

"Article 19: Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers."

"Article 20(1): Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and association."

27. The Special Rapporteur also took into account Commission on Human Rights resolution 1992/22, entitled "right to freedom of opinion and expression", adopted without a vote on 28 February 1992. In that resolution, the Commission referred to the link between violations of the right to freedom of opinion and expression and violations of other fundamental rights, such as the rights to liberty, security, life, privacy, peaceful assembly, protection against torture, and freedom of movement and religion; considered that the effective promotion of the human rights of persons who exercise the right to freedom of opinion and expression is of fundamental importance to the safeguarding of human dignity; appealed to all States to ensure respect and support for the rights of all persons who exercise the rights to freedom of opinion and expression and the rights to freedom of thought, conscience and religion, peaceful assembly and association, and the right to take part in the conduct of public affairs, or who seek to promote and defend those rights and freedoms and, where any persons have been detained solely for exercising those rights as laid down in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, to release them immediately; also appealed to all States to ensure that persons seeking to exercise those rights and freedoms are not discriminated against, particularly in such areas as employment, housing and social services, or harassed; and invited the Special Rapporteurs to pay particular attention, within the framework of their mandates, to the situation of persons detained, ill-treated or discriminated against for having exercised the right to freedom of opinion and expression.

28. Various provisions of the Cuban Constitution, and the following in particular, are relevant to the protection of the rights mentioned above.

Article 7: "The Cuban Socialist State recognizes and encourages the mass social organizations [...] which comprise various sectors of the population, represent the specific interests of the same and involve them in the tasks of building, consolidating and defending socialist society".

Article 53 "Citizens are recognized to have freedom of speech and of the press in keeping with the objectives of socialist society. The material conditions for the exercise of that right are provided by the fact that the press, radio, television, the cinema and other mass media are State or social property and can never be privately owned, thus ensuring that they are used exclusively in the service of the working people and the interest of society".

Article 54: "The rights of assembly, demonstration and association are exercised by the workers, both manual and intellectual, peasants, women, students and other sectors of the working people, who have the necessary means available for that purpose. The mass social organizations have all the facilities they need to carry out such activities, in which their members enjoy the broadest freedom of speech and opinion, based on the unlimited right of initiative and criticism".

29. The information received by the Special Rapporteur from individuals and non-governmental groups suggests that the framework of protection established by these provisions and the manner in which they are applied do not duly conform to the principle laid down in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, because persons associated with groups whose purpose is to denounce violations of human rights, or groups of differing tendencies which are critical of the current political system, are harassed, even though their actions are perfectly peaceful and they address the authorities in a respectful manner. Furthermore, these groups that have emerged in recent years have not been able to obtain legalization since the numerous applications to the Ministry of Justice for legalization under the Associations Act have gone unanswered. 2/

30. As to freedom of association, the Group which visited Cuba pursuant to Commission on Human Rights decision 1988/106 asked the Government the following questions (E/CN.4.1989/46, para. 58), which the Special Rapporteur considers to be still valid and relevant: "If an organization's application for registration is rejected, what options remain open for persons who wish to exercise their right to associate freely? Are any judicial remedies available? What are the criteria used to approve or reject an application for association? Might this provision limit the options of association, especially political options, and therefore of assembly and expression of persons who do not wish to exercise their rights of association, assembly and expression necessarily through the mass social organizations recognized, protected and promoted by the State? If this is the case, would the channels for political participation be reduced to those organizations which are promoted by the State, thereby eliminating the possibility of the emergence of organizations opposed to the regime?". According to the same report, the Minister of Justice stated that, three years previously, the National Assembly had adopted the Associations Act, which stipulated that associations must be registered and which set forth the requirements for their functioning (ibid., para, 59).

31. As regards the scale of the human rights violations referred to in the present section, the Special Rapporteur considers it worth mentioning, as an example, a document prepared by the organization "Americas Watch", dated 30 September 1992 and updated in January 1993, in which it is stated that more than 250 people associated with human rights groups have been detained since 1989. At least 50 of them have apparently been serving sentences of up to 10 years for their activities in this connection. Others are being held in custody pending trial. At least half of the total have been in custody since September 1991. Many others have remained in custody for short terms in police or State Security Department premises.

32. The principal limitations on the enjoyment of those rights are described below.

A. Trial and sentencing

33. An Amnesty International report of December 1992 indicates that it is difficult to estimate the number of persons sentenced for political reasons since the authorities do not provide information on them, the activities of the national groups which try to follow up these cases are severely restricted and, for some time now, the international human rights organizations have not been allowed access to the country. However, Amnesty International estimates that there are at least 300 to 500 of them at present and that possibly half of them have been sentenced for trying to leave the country illegally. 3/ As stated earlier, Americas Watch supplied the Special Rapporteur with a list of 51 persons, which appears in Annex III.

34. The Special Rapporteur received a wealth of information from various sources about the cases of persons sentenced for offences against State security such as "enemy propaganda", "spreading false information against international peace" and even "rebellion"; for offences against the administrative and judicial authorities, such as "contempt"; or for offences against public order such as "possession of unlawful printed matter" or "unlawful association", to sentences which the persons reporting them regarded as extremely harsh considering the acts to which the accusations related, such as painting slogans on walls, printing and distributing literature considered to be against the Government, organizing peaceful demonstrations, or belonging to organizations considered illegal.

35. The crime of rebellion is characterized in articles 98 and 99 of the 1987 Penal Code as follows:

Article 98: "1. Any person who takes up arms in order to achieve by force any of the following purposes shall be sentenced to deprivation of liberty for 10 to 20 years, or to death:

"(a) To prevent in whole or in part, even if temporarily, the principal organs of the State and of the Government from carrying out their functions;

"(b) To change the economic, political and social regime of the socialist State;

"(c) To change, in whole or in part, the Constitution or the form of government established thereby;

"2. The same penalty shall apply to any person who undertakes any act designed to foster an armed uprising, should such an uprising occur; should such an armed uprising not occur, the sentence shall be deprivation of liberty for 4 to 10 years."

Article 99: "Any person who undertakes any other act designed, directly or indirectly, to achieve a purpose indicated in the preceding article, by violence or other unlawful means, shall be sentenced to deprivation of liberty for 7 to 15 years, unless the act constitutes a greater crime."

As regards the said crime, the Group of Government representatives which visited Cuba pursuant to decision 1988/106 of the Commission on Human Rights asked the Government the following questions: "What is meant by 'or other unlawful means'? Does it mean, for example, that members of any unregistered association that might seek partial changes in the Constitution or the economic, social or political regime in Cuba may be charged with rebellion for having used unlawful means to achieve one of the objectives set forth in article 98, paragraph 1?" (E/CN.4/1989/46, annex XVI).

36. The crime of enemy propaganda is perhaps the one most frequently used as the basis for sentencing persons on political grounds. In one list of persons reportedly serving sentences in 1992 on political grounds, which was prepared by a national group and received by the Special Rapporteur, some 280 of those were recorded as having been sentenced for this crime, which is characterized in article 103 of the Penal Code as follows:

"1. A sentence of deprivation of liberty for one to eight years shall be incurred by any person who:

"(a) Incites against the social order, international solidarity or the socialist State, by means of spoken or written propaganda or in any other form;

"(b) Makes, distributes or possesses propaganda of the type mentioned in the preceding subparagraph;

"2. Any person who disseminates false information or malicious predictions such as are likely to cause alarm or unrest in the population, or public disorder, shall be sentenced to deprivation of liberty for one to four years;

"3. If mass media are used to carry out the acts referred to in the preceding paragraphs, the sentence shall be deprivation of liberty for 7 to 15 years;

"4. Any person who permits the use of mass media as referred to in the preceding paragraph shall be sentenced to deprivation of liberty for one to four years."

37. Also as regards this provision, the aforesaid Group of Government representatives visiting Cuba in 1988 asked the Government the following questions: "What is meant by incitement 'against the social order, international solidarity or the socialist State'? Could this article be used to prevent the free exercise of political criticism and the control of the authorities by the people? Could it constitute a threat to persons who disagree with government policy, both in Cuba and abroad? Lastly, the fact of using the media to express opinions at variance with those of the Government constitutes, in accordance with article 103, paragraph 3, of the Penal Code, an aggravating circumstance as regards the offence defined as enemy propaganda. Would this article constitute a threat to persons who oppose the political regime in Cuba? Would this imply recognition by the criminal law of the prohibition of the use of the media to express opinions at variance with those of the Government?" With reference to the offence of causing alarm, the following questions were asked: "How is it determined when an act, because of the nature, means or occasion of its execution, 'tends to cause public alarm with the aim of creating conditions affecting the security of the State'? What is meant by 'security of the State' and by 'causing Alarm'?" (E/CN.4/1989/46, annex XVI).

38. On the offence of contempt, article 144 of the Penal Code states that:

"1. Anyone who threatens, slanders, defames, insults, abuses or in any way outrages or offends, orally or in writing, the dignity or honour of an authority, civil servant, or his agents or assistants, in the exercise of their duties or on the occasion or on account thereof, shall be subject to deprivation of liberty of three months to one year, or a fine of 100 to 300 cuotas (units of currency) or both.

"2. If the action referred to in the previous paragraph is carried out with respect to the President of the Council of State, the President of the National Assembly of People's Power, the members of the Council of State or of the Council of Ministers or the Deputies to the National Assembly of People's Power, the penalty shall be deprivation of liberty of one to three years."

39. In the context of the above provision, the Group asked: "What form of political criticism might be defined as not offensive and not insulting to the political authorities? Could this article constitute an obstacle to compliance with the constitutional provision granting the people the right to control its representatives and possibly revoke their mandate?" (E/CN.4/1989/46, annex XVI).

40. By way of example, the following are brief descriptions of some cases coming to the attention of the Special Rapporteur that were brought to trial in 1992.

(a) Miguel Angel Ballester Cintas, a member of the National Council for Civil Rights in Cuba from the township of Diez de Octubre, was arrested on 31 July 1992 and taken to the State Security Department in Havana on a charge of enemy propaganda. According to the indictment, Mr. Ballester was arrested after having sent the Council of State a letter, dated 10 April 1992, in which he renounced the medals awarded to him during the campaign in Angola.

(b) Marco Antonio Abad Flamand and Jorge Crespo Díaz were arrested in late 1991 and taken, respectively, to the Combinado del Este and Guanajay prisons. They were accused on a count of enemy propaganda for having produced a documentary entitled Un día cualquiera, which was shown as a try-out in Costa Rica and, according to the report of the Attorney-General's Office, repeatedly attacked the integrity of Fidel Castro, the President of the Council of State and the Council of Ministers, using epithets considered to be insulting and offensive. At the trial in October 1992, the prosecution called for a sentence of eight years' imprisonment.

(c) Santiago Medina Corzo, a physician, was tried on 8 May 1992 at the Santa Clara Provincial Court on charges of enemy propaganda. He was sentenced to four years in prison for having put up a poster - in his Motembo clinic - calling for freedom for political prisoners.

(d) Yndamiro Restano Díaz, a member of the Cuban Human Rights and National Reconciliation Commission and Chairman of the social democratic movement Armonía (MAR), and Maria Elena Aparicio, the coordinator of MAR, were sentenced on charges of rebellion to 10 and 7 years in prison, respectively, by the Havana Provincial Court. Yndamiro Restano had been arrested on 20 December 1991 in the Havana district of Vedado and had been kept for several months without legal aid and without being charged. He was subsequently transferred to the Guanajay prison. The charges were apparently based on the attempts by Mr. Restano's movement to publish a bulletin which allegedly urged civil disobedience. According to the information available, although MAR is of a distinctly pacifist nature and has, since its establishment in 1990, constantly and publicly rejected the use of violence, the prosecutor accused the defendants of recruiting followers and promoting action designed to destroy the country's existing regime, by violent means if necessary.

(e) Sebastián Arcos Bergnes, Vice-Chairman of the Cuban Committee for Human Rights, was arrested in Havana in January 1992 by officers of the State Security Department. A few days before his arrest, during the trial for terrorism, sabotage and enemy propaganda of three men who had been detained on attempting to enter the country illegally, one of the accused was reported to have given the name and address of Sebastián Arcos Bergnes, and of two other leaders of the Committee, Gustavo Arcos Bergnes and Jesús Yanes Pelletier, as persons to contact in the event of problems. The three were arrested the next day. While Gustavo Arcos and Jesús Yanes were released 24 hours later, Sebastián Arcos Bergnes remained under arrest on charges of rebellion. In October 1992, he was sentenced to four years and eight months' deprivation of liberty for an offence of enemy propaganda. In its decision 42/1992 (Cuba), the Working Group on Arbitrary Detention of the Commission on Human Rights considered that Mr. Arcos' detention was arbitrary, being in contravention of articles 9, 10, 11, 19 and 20 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and articles 9, 14, 19 and 21 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Consequently, the Group requested the Government of Cuba to take the necessary steps to remedy the situation (E/CN.4/1993/24).

(f) Angel González Santos was arrested after displaying a poster reading "Down with Fidel" and shouting anti-Government slogans in the streets of Guanabacoa on 19 October 1991. The prosecutor called for a seven-year prison term on charges of enemy propaganda.

(g) Eduardo Vidal Franco, a doctor of internal medicine, Jorge Vázquez Méndez, a university physics student, and Rigoberto Carcelles Ibarra, a specialist at the Academy of Sciences, all members of the Liberation Christian Movement, were charged for "enemy propaganda" and sentenced at Santiago de Cuba in June 1992 to prison terms of six years (Mr. Vidal) and five years (Mr. Vázquez and Mr. Carcelles). According to the prosecutor's provisional conclusions, the charges related to the printing and distribution of "Counterrevolutionary pamphlets stating 'Down with Fidel. Unite for your Country'."

(h) Omar del Pozo Marrero, Chairman of the National Civic Union, was arrested on 19 April 1992. At his trial in August 1992 on charges of revealing State Security secrets (article 95 of the Penal Code), he was sentenced to 15 years in prison. Mr. del Pozo was reported to have obtained information on States Security agents who had infiltrated human rights groups.

(i) José López Quinta, a university professor, was tried on charges of enemy propaganda in the Santa Clara Provincial Court on 5 June 1992 because he had sent a letter to the Rector of the Central University stating his disagreement with government policy and the need for changes in the country. The prosecutor called for an eight-year prison term.

(j) Carlos Pérez Truebas and various other individuals linked to human rights groups in Holguín were arrested on 22 January 1992 by State Security agents. All were released some days later except Carlos Pérez Truebas, who was charged for enemy propaganda in Case No. 2 of 1992 having been found in possession of the first draft of a book containing political poems.

(k) Orlando Valdés González was arrested in Céspedes, Camagüey province, on 12 March 1992 for making remarks in a shop about the high price of tobacco. As a result of oral proceedings in the Céspedes Municipal Court on 20 March, he was sentenced to three months' correctional labour;

(l) Pedro Mejías Febre, René Domínguez, Mirla Herrene, Julio Benítez, José Naranjo and Flavio Fuentecilla, members of the Cuban Committee for Human Rights in the city of Guantánamo, were arrested on 9 January 1992. Mr. Mejías was severely beaten during his arrest and on various occasions up until his trial in the Provincial Court, when he was sentenced to one year's deprivation of liberty for unlawful association. The other persons mentioned were sentenced to six months' deprivation of liberty for the same offence.

(m) Bienvenida Cúcalo Santana, Secretary-General of the Cuban Female Humanitarian Movement, and Joel Dueñas Martínez, a member of that Movement, were arrested in Havana on 31 December 1991. Mrs. Cúcalo was released on bail. Mr. Dueñas Martínez, an epileptic, was taken in turn to the Tenth Police Station, the "Villa Marista" detention centre of the State Security Department, the Havana Psychiatric Hospital, the Carlos J. Finlay Military Hospital, the Combinado del Este Prison and the Taco-Taco Prison in Pinar del Rio. At the trial in September 1992, Mr. Dueñas was sentenced to four years' imprisonment, and Mrs. Cúcalo to three years' imprisonment, for enemy propaganda.

(n) Luis Alberto Pita Santos, Chairman of the Association for the Defence of Political Rights (ADDEPO), was arrested in Havana on 9 October 1991. He was initially held at the Sixth Police Station before being moved in turn to the Psychiatric Hospital, the Carlos J. Finlay Military Hospital and the Valle Grande Prison. He was put on trial in April 1992 and sentenced to five years' imprisonment for contempt, unlawful association, incitement to break the law and possession of illegal printed matter.

(o) José Luis Pujol Irizar, a founder member of the Criterio Alternativo and Proyecto de Apertura de la Isla (PAIS) groups, was arrested in Havana on 3 March 1992 and taken first to the Department of Technical Investigations and later to the Micro-10 Prison in Alamar. In September 1992, he was sentenced to three years' deprivation of liberty for contempt, for having criticized President Fidel Castro in a letter addressed to someone abroad.

41. A necessary comment with respect to this list of incidents and the way that the law is applied in each case is that it is completely impossible to express views which in any way run counter to the official line, even if addressed to the authorities respectfully.

B. Threats and intimidation

42. The Special Rapporteur also received information concerning a large number of cases in which individuals were apparently subjected to threats or intimidation by agents linked to the State Security apparatus for reasons connected with their exercise of the right to freedom of opinion, assembly or association. In some cases, the threats were reported to have been made in the course of questioning carried out after such individuals were summoned to police or State Security premises. Thus, for example, 26 intellectuals were summoned to Villa Marista, the State Security headquarters, in early August 1992, where they were questioned and threatened because they had signed and sent a message to the Heads of State and Government attending the Second Ibero-American Summit which requested help in persuading the Government to recognize the existence of dissident groups, to respect the right to freedom of expression and to facilitate dialogue. A police record was established for each one of them, including a handwriting sample and a signed statement. This is also true in the case of Luis Enrique González Pérez, who was threatened in the course of questioning at a police station in Havana, at the intersection of Calle 15 and Dolores, where he was summoned on 26 May 1992. During the questioning, he was accused of being a member of the Liberation Christian Movement, collecting signatures for a bill introduced to the National Assembly of People's Power in 1990 by Oswaldo Payá, the movement's national coordinator, and distributing clandestine propaganda.

43. At other times the threats are made during visits to the home or workplace of the person in question, or the persons are subjected to verbal and/or physical abuse in the street. Thus, for example, it is reported that Mr. Juan Betancourt Morejón was assaulted on 21 February 1992 by two individuals who shot at him from an unloaded pistol and threatened to kill him if he persisted in his activities as General Secretary of the Cuban Pro-Human Rights Party. Mr. Betancourt subsequently went into exile. Meanwhile, it is reported that Mr. Lázaro Linares Echavarría, a member of the Cuban Human Rights and National Reconciliation Commission, was summoned on 28 July 1992 to an office of the revolution defence committees on Calle Aguila, between Puerta Cerrada and Vives in Old Havana, by a State Security officer and other representatives of government organizations, who threatened him with physical harm. This also happened in the case of Mr. Ignacio Hidalgo Gómez, a member of the Cuban Committee for Human Rights in Holguín: he was threatened by a State Security Department officer who visited him at his workplace on 13 April 1992. Subsequently, on 17 April, he was assaulted by various individuals in the street.

44. Situations similar to those described also occurred in 1992 in the cases of Rolando Prats, a member of the Democratic Social Movement; Lázaro Corp Yeras and Manuel Manrique Zulueta, members of the Steering Committee of Cuba's General Union of Workers; Laercy del Prado Maceo, a member of the Cuban Committee for Human Rights delegation from Palma Soriano; Lázaro Alberto Fernández Hidalgo, a delegate of the National Council for Civil Rights in Cuba from San Antonio de los Baños; Oswaldo Paya and Dagoberto Capote Mesa of the Christian Liberation Movement; Félix Fleitas Posado of the Association for Constitutional Democracy; and Betsy Becerra of the Committee of Independent Mothers for Granting Amnesty to Political Prisoners.

45. One particular form of intimidation is that of performing so-called "acts of repudiation" or protests organized - apparently officially - by the "Rapid Response Brigades", in which a large group of individuals, some of whom are said to have been identified as members of the security forces in civilian clothing, gathers around the home of a person alleged to be involved in what are seen as counter-revolutionary activities, shouts insults and threats for several hours and does damage to property. Some members of the Communist Party are also reported to have been expelled from the party for refusing to join the Rapid Response Brigades, and students are said to have been threatened by school authorities for the same reasons. In many cases, the police are present at such acts of repudiation but do not intervene; sometimes, at the end, they proceed to arrest the individuals who are "repudiated".

46. By way of example, this sort of treatment is reported to have been applied this year to Mr. Fernando Núñez, who underwent an "act of repudiation" by a group of some 200 people in front of his home on 28 January 1992 after having sent a letter to the newspaper Granma criticizing one of its articles.

47. Mr. Francisco Chaviano González, Chairman of the National Council for Civil Rights in Cuba, underwent an "act of repudiation" in front of his house in Jaimanitas, Municipio Player, Havana, on 14 July 1992. The next day, the officer in charge of the Jaimanitas sector was reported to have begun summoning a large number of young people who had come to Mr. Chaviano's assistance and to have threatened to put them on record as "dangerous". In addition, a guard was said to have been prominently mounted in front of his home for the purpose of intimidation, together with a display of posters announcing that Mr. Chaviano was changing his address.

48. The family of Luis Alberto Pita Santos (see para.40 (n)) was also the subject of an "act of repudiation" on 31 January 1992 in front of its residence in Havana. Luis Pita y Nivaldo and Jorge Daniel Pita Santos, father and brother of Luis Alberto Pita Santos, were ill-treated and a number of human rights activists (Lázaro Loreto Perea, Angel Viera, Fernando Núñez and Rafael García) who happened to be at their house at that time were arrested by officials of the Ministry of the Interior and taken to the Sixth Police Station but were released on the same day.

49. Mrs. Angela de la Caba, Chairwoman of the Committee of Independent Mothers for Granting Amnesty to Political Prisoners, was also the subject of an act of repudiation on 7 April 1992 carried out by a group of journalists, in addition to being frequently harassed together with other members of her Committee. Moreover, on 29 May 1992, members of the Rapid Response Brigades and the State Security Department used threats and a show of force to prevent members of this Committee from holding a meeting in the Las Mercedes church.

50. During December 1992, Mr. Gustavo Arcos Bergnes of the Cuban Committee for Human Rights, whose house was surrounded on 10 December and was still under surveillance at the end of the month, together with Mr. Jesús Yáñez Pelleitier, 75 years of age, and Mrs. Aida Valdés Santana, who are also members of this Committee and were severely beaten, were victims of incidents of this kind. At the same time the houses of the following persons were placed under surveillance: Vladimiro Roca, President of the Social Democratic Movement; Osvaldo Payá, President of the Liberation Christian Movement, Néstor Castellanos, President of the Solidarity and Peace group; Amador Blanco, Chairman of the José Martí Human Rights Commission; Rolando Prats of the Social Democratic Movement; and Gustavo Peña Escobar of National Democratic Convergence.

51. Incidents such as those described above suggest that, apart from the cases which are mentioned in the preceding section and are more striking because custodial penalties were imposed, the authorities also appear to be implementing a deliberate policy to intimidate human rights activists by methods that are unacceptable in any society where the rule of law holds sway.

C. Temporary detentions

52. The Special Rapporteur also received case reports on persons who, for exercising the rights of opinion, assembly or association, had been held in custody for a few hours or a few days, interrogated and later released without being charged. Undoubtedly, in these cases the aim was to intimidate the detainees. For the duration of their detention, detainees are often kept incommunicado: they are not allowed to contact their families (who do not know their whereabouts) or to have access to legal counsel. In some cases, such persons are forced to sign, before their release, so-called "official warnings". 4/

53. The following cases are some of those of which the Special Rapporteur has taken cognizance:

(a) Lorenzo García, an activist of the Cuban Committee for Human Rights of Holguín, was arrested by State Security officials in the centre of Holguín in the course of his investigations into the arrest on 25 June 1992 of a number of youths. He was taken to the First Police Station and interrogated for four hours by a State Security official who tried to make him sign a warning.

(b) María Valdés Rosado, President of the Cuban Christian Democrat Movement, was arrested on 23 September 1992 and taken to the State Security building at Calles Aldavoz and Cien where she underwent an interrogation and was threatened before being released two days later. Since May 1992, she has been harassed by State Security forces and her telephone conversations have been continuously tapped.

(c) Pedro Luis Girón Bermúdez, a resident of Havana, was arrested on 3 March 1992 in Ciudad de Nueva Gerona, Isla de la Juventud, and taken to a local State Security Station where he was interrogated and warned that he would be brought before the courts if any evidence was found that he was involved in any human rights activity in that municipality.

(d) Heriberto Acebedo and Héctor Pachá were arrested on 5 March 1992 in Ciudad de Nueva Gerona, Isla de la Juventud, after thorough searches of their homes where some pamphlets with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, a typewriter and other personal belongings were seized. They were taken to the Nueva Gerona State Security office and interrogated. Héctor Pachá was detained for five days.

(e) Elizardo Sánchez Santa Cruz, President of Cuban Democratic Concertation, was arrested in Havana on 10 December 1992 by State Security agents who beat her severely as well as causing damage to her house. She had to be taken to hospital as a result of her injuries. She was later transferred to the detention centre of the Technical Department of Investigations at Calles Cien and Aldavoz. She was accused of creating a public disturbance and released on bail. During the current year, Mrs. Sánchez Santa Cruz has been arrested on a further two occasions.

(f) Also arrested on 10 December were Rodolfo González of the Cuban Committee for Human Rights, detained by State Security agents who searched his home, and Adolfo Miranda Calderón of the Confederation of Democratic Cuban Workers. At the time this report was completed, they were still in detention, and proceedings had been instituted against Rodolfo González on a charge of spreading false information.

D. Loss of jobs

54. According to reports, this type of intimidation is particularly cruel because it is impossible for the persons affected to find other jobs within their profession as the State is the sole employer. The following specific cases were reported:

(a) Dimas Cecilio Castellanos, a philosophy professor at the Havana Institute of Advanced Agricultural Sciences, was expelled from his department in early 1992 after he was accused by the university authorities of having in his possession a tape recording of the so-called "Synthesis of the Social Democratic Project". His dismissal also meant that he was banned from teaching in any of the country's centres of learning.

(b) Georgina González Corvo, Danilo Alonso Santana, Rafael González Dalmau, Miguel Morales Acosta, Ramsés Pérez Menéndez, Pedro Rubio Castillo and Rafael Sariol, lecturers at the José Antonio Echevarría Advanced Politechnical Institute in Havana, were fired from their jobs in January 1992 after signing a letter demanding amnesty for political prisoners, respect for human rights and democratic reforms. José Ricardo Muñoz, a researcher, and María Martínez Martínez, a secretary, were also fired for signing the letter. Three other signatories, Néstor Castellanos Martínez and Carlos Delgado Abad, lecturers at the Enrique José Varona Advanced Educational Institute, and Luis Brito López, a graduate, who had shown their solidarity with their colleagues, were also fired a few days later.

(c) Juan Antonio Rodríguez Avila, a computer technician, was fired at the Empresa de Proyecto de Industrias Varias, which belongs to the State Committee for Economic Cooperation, during this year for dissenting from the official line of the Communist Party and supporting the proposals of the Christian Liberation Movement for a bill calling for a national dialogue.

(d) Néstor Baguer, a journalist of the National News Agency and Radio Cadena Habana; Manuel Díaz Martínez, of Radio Enciclopedia and an editor at the Cuban Radio and Television Institute; and Vladimiro Roca, who worked at the State Committee for Economic Cooperation, were fired for sending to the Central Committee of the Communist Party a document entitled the "Social Democratic Project" which proposed democratic changes and reform of the Constitution. That Project had been sharply criticized in editorials of the local dailies, Granma and Juventud Rebelde, of 21 January and 16 February 1992 respectively. After his dismissal, Vladimiro Roca was the target of an "act of repudiation" in front of his house on 20 February 1992. Another signatory of this document, Enrique Julio Paterson, was summoned to the Villa Marista and interrogated on 6 February 1992.

(e) Aida Rosa Jiménez Rodríguez, Secretary of the Pro-Democratic Civic Association, was expelled from her post as Spanish and literature teacher at the Gervasio Cabrera education centre in July 1992. The reasons given in the letter of dismissal were that Mrs. Jiménez had requested permission not to participate in the assembly on outstanding work performance that was to be held at that centre since she considered her presence at the assembly to be pointless and rejected the political and revolutionary values of Cuban society;

(f) Ignacio Hidalgo Gómez, a member of the Cuban Committee for Human Rights in Holguín, was expelled from his place of work ("comunales municipal") in April 1992 for expressing views running counter to official State policy.

55. The Special Rapporteur also received information that some spouses of members of human rights groups were dismissed from their jobs in retaliation for the activities of their husbands. The following cases in particular were singled out:

(a) Xiomara González Figueroa was dismissed from the newspaper Juventud Rebelde where she had been working as a journalist for 23 years. The reason invoked was that she was "no longer fit to work in the organ of a political organization". The informers suspect, however, that the real reason is that Mrs. González is the wife of Fernando Velásquez Medina, leader of the Criterio Alternativo group who has been in jail since November 1991.

(b) Teresa Peña Pupo, wife of Jorge Daniel Pita Santos, member of the Association for the Defence of Political Rights, was fired from her job at the Los Galleguitos kindergarten, Havana, on 18 February 1992, after she had been warned several times by the headmistress about her matrimonial tie.

(c) Mayra González Castellanos, girlfriend of Sebastián Arcos Bergnes (see para. 40 (e)), was dismissed on 13 April 1992 from the National Sugar Cane Research Institute where she had been working for eight years. According to Dismissal Order No. 16/92 of the Sugar Cane Institute, to which the Special Rapporteur had access, the dismissal was due to "unreliability" because Mrs. González "maintains close relations with a citizen who is hostile to socialism and heralds capitalist ideas about human rights in Cuba, which is clearly at variance with the policy of our Institute". With respect to the last phrase, the Special Rapporteur would like to stress that, in his opinion, human rights are universal and cannot be linked to any specific ideology.

V. TRADE UNION FREEDOM

56. In line with what was stated in section IV, the Special Rapporteur received reports concerning the impossibility of establishing independent trade union organizations and the monopoly exercised in that regard by the Central Organization of Cuban Workers (CTC), the official trade union. According to the information received, in 1991 a group of workers set up, and requested legalization of, the General Union of Cuban Workers (UGTC).

However, they never received a reply to their request and indeed several members of UGTC, including its president, Rafael Gutiérrez, received threats.

57. The Special Rapporteur has found out that a complaint relating to substantially the same facts was examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association of the International Labour Organisation (ILO) at its 254th session, held from 16 to 19 November 1992. In this regard, it should be noted that Cuba has ratified both the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87) and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention (No. 98) of the ILO. Having considered the complaint, the Committee formulated the following provisional conclusions:

"1024. The Committee notes that in the present case the complainant [the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions - ICFTU] has raised the following issues: (1) the failure of the Ministry of Justice to reply to the General Union of Cuban Workers' (UGTC) request for recognition and acknowledgement of its legal personality, in spite of the legal time-lapse of 60 days; and (2) the violent attack against Rafael Gutiérrez, president of the UGTC, by a 'rapid intervention brigade' which was part of a 'protest campaign' instigated by the Government, and the detention of the above-mentioned official for 48 hours without any charges being brought against him and no explanation being given as to the grounds for his arrest.

1025. The Committee notes the Government's observations to the effect that: (1) the UGTC is not known, either by the workers, the general public or the social partners representing the various decision-making bodies within the industrial relations system; (2) there are more than 3.5 million workers in Cuba, of whom 96.7 per cent belong to trade union organizations of their own choosing; the so-called trade union organization mentioned by the ICFTU does not exist in the country, neither does it have any representativity whatsoever amongst Cuban workers; (3) Mr. Rafael Gutiérrez is not being held, neither are there any criminal charges against him; and (4) the AFL-CIO and the ICFTU have plans to interfere in Cuban trade unionism by promoting industrial sabotage and trying to bribe the trade union officials; these are anti-Cuban activities designed to bring about political destabilization.

1026. The Committee deplores the fact that the Government has not sent specific information on the failure of the Ministry of Justice to reply to the General Union of Cuban Workers' request for registration and recognition of its legal personality. Indeed, the Government merely stated that this organization 'does not exist', in spite of the fact that the statutes of this organization were communicated by the complainant and that the names of six persons were mentioned in these statutes. The Committee also deplores the fact that the Government also failed to provide information on the allegations concerning the violent attack against Mr. Rafael Gutiérrez, founder and president of the UGTC. In these circumstances, the Committee must point out that the right of workers to establish organizations of their own choosing implies, in particular, the effective possibility of forming, in a climate of full security, organizations independent both of those which exist already and of any political party. [...]. The Committee urges the Government to send precise observations on these allegations to which it did not reply in a specific way and to decide, without delay, on the request for registration submitted by the UGTC, taking full account of the fact that under Article 2 of Convention No. 87, workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization.

1027. As regards the detention of the president of the UGTC for 48 hours, the Committee deplores the fact that the Government did not send specific information on this detention and merely pointed out that Mr. Gutiérrez was not 'being held' and that no criminal charges have been brought against him. The Committee therefore urges the Government to send without delay its observations on this matter. It draws to its attention the principle that when the authorities arrest trade unionists without a warrant or it is subsequently found that no grounds exist for conviction, this constitutes a clear violation of trade union rights. [...].

1028. Finally, as regards the Government's statements concerning the complainant organization's plans to interfere in the Cuban trade union movement, the Committee points out that any assistance or support that an international trade union organization might provide in setting up, defending or developing national trade union organizations is a legitimate trade union activity, even when the trade union tendency does not correspond to the tendency or tendencies within the country. The Committee also points out that the recriminations and value judgements which the Government makes in a general way against the complainant are not admissible, neither may they be taken into account as part of the procedure of the Committee, which is only authorized to examine complaints against governments and not against workers' or employers' organizations." 5/

58. Furthermore, the ILO Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, in its report to the 79th session of the International Labour Conference, held in June 1992, made the following observations regarding the application of Convention No. 87 by Cuba:

"[...] the Committee once again points out that certain sections of the Labour Code by referring explicitly to the 'Central Organization of Workers' of Cuba enshrines the system of trade union unity at the top level in the legislation. Accordingly, the Committee again recalls that in its General Survey of 1983 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, it made it clear, in paragraph 137, that even in a case where a de facto monopoly exists as a consequence of all the workers having grouped together, legislation should not institutionalize this factual situation, for example, by designating the single central organization by name, even if the existing trade union so requests. Even in a situation where, at some point in the history of a nation, all workers have preferred to unify the trade union movement, they should none the less be able to safeguard their freedom to set up, should they so wish in the future, unions outside the established trade union structure. [...].

[...] the designation of the CTC as the single organization at the central level in the legislation does not enable the workers to establish and join organizations of a different nature and independent of the public authorities, which is contrary to Articles 2, 3, 5 and 6 of the Convention." 6/

VI. RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

59. Article 18 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights provides that:

"Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance".

60. The constitutional reform of July 1992 introduced important improvements in this area through a new article 8 reading as follows:

"The State recognizes, respects and guarantees religious freedom.

In the Republic of Cuba, religious institutions are separated from the State.

The different beliefs and religions enjoy equal consideration".

Moreover, article 55 provides:

"The State, which recognizes, respects and guarantees freedom of conscience and religion, also recognizes, respects and guarantees the freedom of every citizen to change religious beliefs or not to have any, and, subject to respect for the law, to profess the religion of his preference".

This provision replaces former article 54, which read:

"The socialist State, which bases its activity and educates the people in the scientific materialist concept of the universe, recognizes and guarantees freedom of conscience and the right of everyone to profess any religious belief and, subject to respect for the law, to practise the religion of his preference.

The law regulates the activities of religious institutions.

It is illegal and punishable by law to oppose one's faith or religious belief to the Revolution, to education or to the fulfilment of one's duty to work, defend the homeland with arms, show reverence for its symbols and fulfil other duties established by the Constitution".

In addition to these constitutional reforms, the IVth Congress of the Communist Party held in October 1991 decided that persons belonging to a religious group could also be members of the Communist Party.

61. Despite these improvements in the protection of the right to religious freedom, the Special Rapporteur received information concerning persons who were reportedly harassed for belonging to religious groups. Particular attention should be drawn to the following:

(a) Angel Gámez Argüelles was allegedly threatened by the police in connection with his membership of the Seventh Day Adventist Church in Duaba Arriba, Guantánamo province. Moreover, on 7 March 1992, the police reportedly prohibited him from holding a meeting with members of that Church.

(b) Eduardo Licea and his family, residents of Palmarito del Canto, Santiago de Cuba province, were allegedly harassed for belonging to the Jehovah's Witnesses Christian movement. Apparently a fine of 900 pesos was imposed on them after a bible and other religious literature had been found during a police search of their house.

62. With regard to the harassment to which, according to the information received, Jehovah's Witnesses are subjected, the Special Rapporteur would like to refer to the Government's reply to a communication on this subject from the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on religious intolerance, (E/CN.4/1993/62, para.24). According to this reply:

"In Cuba, there are 41 congregations of the Catholic religion and 51 institutions or associations of Protestant congregations. In other words, any religious association or association that fulfils the requirements laid down in the existing Act on the Registration of Associations may operate and is highly respected and supported as such. However, the religious sect of 'Jehovah's Witnesses' [...] has never submitted an application for registration since it does not fulfil the requirements established for recognition and has therefore not acquired that status.

In our country this religious sect is an unlawful association, whose members are known for their anti-social behaviour and who, in many cases, even engage in incitement to break the law and in the desecration of patriotic emblems, since they regard themselves as foreigners in their own country. In cases involving the above-mentioned criminal behaviour [...] the following articles of the current Penal Code are applied: article 207, paragraph 1 (Incitement to break the law); article 208 (Unlawful associations, meetings and demonstrations); article 210 (Possession of illegal printed matter)."

VII. RIGHT TO LEAVE AND ENTER THE COUNTRY

63. The Special Rapporteur considered the reports received in this area in the context of article 13, paragraph 2, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which provides that "Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country".

64. Illegal departure from the territory of Cuba is defined as an offence in article 216 of the Penal Code as follows:

"1. Any person who, without fulfilling the legal formalities, departs from or takes action with a view to departing from the national territory, shall be liable to a custodial penalty for a term of one to three years, or to a fine of 300 to 1,000 cuotas (units of currency).

"2. If, for the purpose of the act referred to in the preceding paragraph, force or intimidation is used against persons, or objects are seized by force, the custodial penalty shall be for a term of three to eight years."

65. It was reported that in order for a citizen to leave the country legally, even for a short time, he or she has to have an exit visa, a formality that is in practice difficult to fulfil given the large number of applications, even though, in 1991, the minimum age for travel abroad was reduced to 20 for men and women - no doubt a significant step in this area. There is no right of appeal against an administrative decision to deny an exit visa, which means that the administration enjoys considerable discretionary power.

66. On this subject, the report of the mission undertaken to Cuba in accordance with decision 1988/106 of the Commission on Human Rights includes the following observations:

"The President of the Council of State told the group that, generally speaking, his Government grants authorization so that people who want to leave the country can do so, the idea being that nobody should stay in Cuba by force. However, he said that there are some exceptions to this rule, including professionals and scientists, former officers in the Armed Forces, persons in possession of military secrets, deserters or their relatives, and young persons liable to military service. He went on to mention that, apart from these persons, there are many others who have permission to leave the country, but not the relevant visa, and the responsibility for this situation lies not with Cuba, but with the United States, the country to which most emigrants wish to go. He urged the United States and Western European countries to display a readiness to solve this problem and issue visas to all persons who want to leave Cuba." (E/CN.4/1989/46, para.86).

67. Immigration restrictions imposed by other countries, as mentioned in the above quotation, and other reasons such as the fear of the legal procedures (which, in addition to being complicated, have traditionally led to reprisals and discrimination) have made many people try to leave the country without applying for permission. In terms of the devices employed and the numbers involved, it can be said that most people who leave the country illegally do so by sea, using, among other things, tyres and small home-made boats kept afloat by anything buoyant, e.g. plastic containers, foam, tarpaulins, empty barrels, etc. Between the beginning of 1992 and the end of September, some 1,900 people are estimated to have reached, by sea, the United States or such other places as the Bahamas, Guatemala, Grand Cayman or the United States naval base at Guantánamo. At the same time, it is estimated that only one out of every four attempting to leave the country in this way succeeded.

68. It is also reported that many persons have been injured or have drowned at sea as a result of the violent methods used by the law enforcement forces in making arrests. It is reported, for example, that on 18 July 1992, 14 miles from the Cuban coast, coastguard vessel No. 554 rammed a makeshift raft carrying seven persons attempting to leave the country, destroying the raft and injuring the youths José Manuel Curiel, from Puentes, San Andrés y Obispo, Guanabacoa; Pablo Valentín Reyes Carrasco, from Corrales, between Nazareno and Bertematis, Guanabacoa; and José Raúl Batista Díaz, from Casablanca. On 30 August 1992, a raft carrying 15 persons was rammed by a torpedo boat, as a result of which the following persons were lost at sea: Pablo Torres Delgado, 28 years of age, Mercedes Rodríguez Luna, 17; Carlos Docal Luna, 13; Delia Guerra Saénz, 31; Alberto Guerra Sáenz, 26; Bernardo Aranda Ríos, 22; and Pedro Suárez Ramos, 28, all from San Miguel del Padrón.

69. Pursuant to article 216 of the Penal Code, charges are brought not only against those arrested after beginning the journey, but also against those under suspicion as persons who might try to leave. For instance, the Special Rapporteur received information concerning Oscar Fernández García and Jorge Guerrero Batista, who were arrested on 7 October 1991 at a place known as Playa Covento in the Paraguay district of the province of Guantánamo. Those citizens were arrested on the grounds that they were in a prohibited zone; nevertheless, according to information received, at the time of their arrest, they were at a bus stop and, accordingly, in an unrestricted area. They were taken first to a police station in the city of Guantánamo, then to State Security premises, where they remained incommunicado for 23 days, and lastly to the prison in the city of Guantánamo. In May 1992, they were tried for attempting to leave the country illegally, and were sentenced to one year in prison.

70. Other cases of which the Special Rapporteur has been informed concern persons who were denied permission to leave the country, even though they had the appropriate entry visas from foreign countries. This was true of the following cases:

(a) Rolando Roque Malherbe, a researcher at the National Centre for Scientific Research, who was denied permission to leave the country in order to take up an appointment at a Spanish institution. He was also denied permission to travel to Venezuela, where he had been invited to give some lectures. According to Mr. Roque Malherbe, the reasons why his applications were turned down one after another had to do with the fact that he had, in the past, stated privately that he did not agree with Marxist ideology. He sees no merit in the arguments given by his superiors to justify the repeated rejections, namely that his presence at the Centre is indispensable, since in fact he has been marginalized in his research work and has even been threatened with dismissal;

(b) Ricardo López Castillo. In 1992, he was denied permission to leave the country for a period of five years because, according to what he was told at the Immigration Office, his son, a former conductor of the Afrocubana Orchestra, had left the country;

(c) Antonio Arturo Fernández Esquivel. For years he was refused permission to leave the country despite having a visa for the United States, where his mother lives. In 1983, Mr. Fernández Esquivel was dismissed from his post as a doctor at the Calixto García Teaching Hospital for having expressed political opinions opposed to the Cuban Revolution.

71. A third group of reports relates to the situation of families that remain divided because, even though family members residing in Cuba have entry visas for the countries to which they would like to travel, the authorities have denied them permission to leave in order to join other family members. In many of these cases, the refusal to permit wives and children to leave is reported to be in retaliation for the activities or political opinions of the head of the family, or for his having left the country illegally. The following are in this group: Ernesto Luque, who is not being allowed to leave the country to join his parents residing in the United States; Gladys Menéndez Fernández and Marlene Cardoso Menéndez, who were granted Canadian residence visas in 1990; Maribel Bárbara Govín and her young children Lexia Coro Govín and Ramiro Coro Govín, who have had entry visas to the United States since 1990; Divier Reimondo Velázquez, who was not allowed to travel to the United States with his parents in November 1989 and has still not been granted permission; Carlos Enrique and María Beatriz García González, who are of legal age and have visas to travel to Spain, where their parents have been living since July 1992; Ileana Pérez Quintana and her small children Daniel and Daría Camacho Pérez, who have had United States entry visas since 1990. In connection with some of these cases, it was reported that the denial of authorization to leave the country had been accompanied by reprisals, such as dismissal from employment.

72. Finally, the Special Rapporteur was informed that persons who have left the country legally for an indefinite period also need an entry permit in order to return, even temporarily. In this connection, too, the authorities are reported to act very arbitrarily.

VIII. CONDITIONS IN THE PRISONS

73. The Special Rapporteur received many case reports on conditions in the prisons which, in his opinion, are largely inconsistent with the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners 7/ and the Code of Conduct for Law Enforcement Officials 8/ and even with the provisions of the Cuban Penal Code itself regarding imprisonment (arts. 30 and 31). Many of these reports concern the shortage and poor quality of the food served to prisoners, which is unfit for human consumption. Spontaneous protests arising from this situation are often repressed through imprisonment in special punishment areas and brutal beatings.

74. The reports also repeatedly mention the alarming lack of medical care for prisoners, most of whom are ill from the food situation and unhygienic conditions. Many fatal cases of beri beri, for example, are reported to have occurred in such prisons as Canapeta, in Ciego de Avila; Agüica, in Matanzas; and Jovellanos, Combinado Sur, Matanzas. Many of the reports referred to the situation of prisoners suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS), with particular emphasis on a group of approximately 30 of them who are in the punishment area called "los candados" ("the locked up") in building No. 3 of the Combinado del Este prison. According to the information received, the care given to these prisoners is not much better than the meagre care provided by the prison staff; they have been denied the assistance of specialists.

75. Various sources supplied the Special Rapporteur with a list of prisoners who are serving sentences for political offences and are constantly denied medical care. Their illnesses were identified (diabetes, tuberculosis, duodenal ulcers, etc).

76. The sources mentioned several cases in which lack of medical care had led to death. For example, Rodolfo Gómez Ramos, 42 years old, died in March 1992 after being denied medical treatment at Micro 4 de Alamar prison in Havana, where he was serving a sentence for attempting to leave the country illegally. In view of his serious medical condition, caused by an ulcer, Mr. Gómez Ramos repeatedly asked to be moved to hospital. His requests went unheeded; instead, arrangements were made to transfer him to a stricter prison, Agüica, in the province of Matanzas. Apparently it was while he was being moved that he died. According to information received, a commission of inquiry was appointed after the death. The Special Rapporteur does not know what the Commission's findings were. It was also reported that on 1 February 1992, Francisco Díaz Mesa, 24 years old, died at Alambrada de Manacas prison, in Villa Clara. He was denied medical treatment after contracting pneumonia. According to information received, shortly before he died, he tried to get the attention of the guards; they gave him a severe beating, and he died shortly afterwards without receiving medical assistance.

77. Beatings are another recurrent theme in the reports. Far from being isolated incidents, they apparently are administered regularly by the prison authorities in order to punish or intimidate. Moreover, complaints of maltreatment addressed to the relevant authorities never seem to get anywhere. Among the cases mentioned was that of an inmate at Alambrada de Manacas prison, Bienvenido Martínez Bustamante, who was severely beaten on 8 June 1992, supposedly for criticizing the Revolution. It is reported that he had bruises all over his body, that his face was disfigured and that he had lost consciousness; nevertheless, he received no medical attention whatsoever. There was also the case of Ibelise Camejo Moleiro, who was brutally beaten on 4 May 1992 at Guanajay prison because he had written a letter to the authorities complaining about being in solitary confinement, having no water for personal hygiene and being denied correspondence. It is also reported that Brisuela Angulo, Héctor Romero Yanes and Alexis López Padrón, inmates at Combinado del Este prison, were beaten in late November 1992, after requesting medical assistance or demanding better treatment of prisoners, and that hunger strikes staged by some prisoners in protest against their living conditions are often repressed with beatings and confinement in punishment areas.

78. According to the reports, the situation with regard to scarcity of food and medicine, denial of medical care, unhealthy conditions and physical maltreatment is at its worst at provincial prisons such as Kilo 7 prison (Camagüey), Cinco y Medio prison (Pinar del Río), Agüica prison (Matanzas), Boniato prison (Santiago de Cuba) and Alambrada de Manacas prison (Villa Clara).

79. There were also reports about conditions at labour camps ("correccionales laborales"), particularly those at Motembo and Quesada. The inmates are forced to perform arduous agricultural work in an undernourished state and sometimes sick and barefoot. According to the reports, workers being punished for indiscipline in the workplace, for economic transgressions and for other similar offences are sent to such centres.

IX. CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

80. The Government of Cuba has so far refused to cooperate at all with the Special Rapporteur, but nevertheless the Special Rapporteur continues to hope that, in the not too distant future, there will be an opportunity to open a dialogue and to make working visits to Cuba.

81. The Cuban Government's position is based on the arguments set out below. Firstly, the Government questions the legality of the procedure whereby the Special Rapporteur was appointed. The Government's complaint was forwarded to the Office of Legal Affairs (see annex II), which issued a contrary opinion on 30 April 1992. Any doubt on the matter must therefore be considered as having been dispelled.

82. Secondly, the Government maintains that there are no human rights violations in Cuba, at least not on a scale comparable to the situations of mass violations existing in many countries being monitored by the Commission on Human Rights under agenda item 12. Accordingly, the Government maintains that the study of the human rights situation in Cuba in this context is unjustified and is entirely politically motivated.

83. In this connection, the Special Rapporteur wishes to make a number of observations. His mandate does indeed have a political origin, in that it derives from a resolution of the Commission on Human Rights, which is a politically constituted body. Regardless of this, however, it is the obligation of the Special Rapporteur, as of all rapporteurs and experts appointed by the Commission on Human Rights, to discharge his duties with impartiality, independence and objectivity, taking as points of reference the values embodied in international human rights instruments, particularly the Universal Declaration. While these instruments may also be said to have a political content, in that they are the result of a specific conception of the individual, society and the State, they have been universally recognized and now represent a minimum standard, regardless of the social or ideological situation prevailing in a given country.

84. In addition to the above observations, the Special Rapporteur wishes to point out that, under Article 56 of the Charter of the United Nations, States pledge to cooperate with the Organization for the achievement of the purposes set forth in Article 55, one of which (subparagraph (c)) is the promotion of universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms.

85. This report and its recommendations focus on such basic rights as freedom of opinion, assembly and association, as well as trade union freedom and religious freedom. It also describes the practices followed by the Government in regard to freedom of movement and draws attention to the situation of the prison population, particularly of persons serving sentences for offences with political connotations. The report does not mention the right to life because, at present, violations in this area, such as summary or arbitrary executions or enforced or involuntary disappearances, are not typical of the Cuban situation. Economic, social and cultural rights have also been omitted.

86. There can be no doubt that the Cuban political system and Cuban society have special characteristics and, as a result, so do the human rights situation and the systematic violations committed. However, this in no way justifies such violations or makes them acceptable. One of the characteristics mentioned in the report which deserves special consideration is the fact that dissidence within the society is expressed in an entirely peaceful manner, in an attempt to avoid any confrontation or violence.

87. In the light of the human rights situation in Cuba as described in this report, the Special Rapporteur, through the Commission on Human Rights, recommends that the Government of Cuba should adopt the following measures with a view to improving the observance of fundamental rights:

(a) Ratify the principal human rights instruments to which Cuba is not a party, in particular, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and its Optional Protocols and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights;

(b) Cease persecuting and punishing citizens for reasons relating to the freedom of peaceful expression and association;

(c) Permit legalization of independent groups, especially those seeking to carry out human rights or trade-union activities, and allow them to act within the law, but independently;

(d) Respect the guarantees of due process, in accordance with the provisions set forth in international instruments;

(e) Ensure greater transparency and guarantees in the prison system, so as to avoid incidents of excessive violence exercised against prisoners. In this connection, it would be a major achievement to renew the agreement with the International Committee of the Red Cross and to allow independent national groups access to prisons;

(f) Review sentences imposed for offences with political connotations and for trying to leave the country illegally;

(g) Expedite and make more transparent the procedure for applying for permission to leave and enter the country, while at the same time avoiding measures of retaliation against the applicants. Family reunification cases should be given priority attention. On this subject, the Special Rapporteur is aware of the need for persons wishing to travel to have visas for entry into other countries.

88. It would be desirable for Cuba's policy on travel abroad to be less strict and, for other countries, in their turn and as a counterpart, to relax the restrictions imposed on their own citizens regarding travel to and communication with Cuba. This, in addition to resolving difficulties from a strictly humanitarian aspect, would help to end the artificial and painful isolation in which the Cuban people live.

89. While not overlooking the urgent need for specific measures, as proposed above, the Special Rapporteur nevertheless wishes to point out that any analysis concerning the situation and implementation of human rights in Cuba must, as a point of departure, accept the fact that the Government is, and has for a long time been, surrounded by an international climate extremely hostile to many of its policies and, in some cases, even to its very existence. This hostile international climate does not seem to have been affected by the vast political, military and economic changes that have taken place in the world in the last few years. Similarly, the changes which have occurred in the previously socialist European countries, as also in the policies of many third world countries, seem to have so far had no impact on Cuba's internal policy. On the other hand, the abrupt breakdown in the flow of aid previously received from abroad, as well as the almost total exclusion of Cuba as a beneficiary of the multilateral financing and technical assistance agencies, have not given the Government much room for manoeuvre in this field. In the opinion of the Special Rapporteur, a policy vis à vis Cuba based on economic sanctions and other measures designed to isolate the island constitute, at the present stage, the surest way of prolonging an untenable internal situation, as the only remedy that would be left for not capitulating to external pressure would be to continue desperate efforts to stay anchored in the past. International sanctions, especially if accompanied by conditions implying the adoption of specific measures, be they political or economic, are totally counterproductive if it is the international community's intention to improve the human rights situation and, at the same time, to create conditions for a peaceful and gradual transition to a genuinely pluralist and civil society. Any suggestion along the lines that the future sovereignty of the Cuban people could be contingent on external powers or forces would, in the collective memory of the Cuban people, evoke traumatic experiences of their not-very-distant history and their fight for independence, and would be a very effective obstacle to the achievement of changes which could be very welcome in other circumstances.

90. Cuba is going through one of the most difficult periods in its recent history so far as the economic situation is concerned. The reasons for this are obvious and they need no elaboration in this report. The level of living has deteriorated to a point where basic services such as public transport have reached levels close to a standstill. Given this situation, the public reaction can be none other than disappointment and despair. On the other hand, the Government seems to be resorting to repressive measures to silence any expression of discontent or independent opinion, however moderate it may be. The persecution of individuals is being carried on, sometimes even at trifling levels, and with a callousness which, in the eyes of an impartial observer, would seem patently out of proportion. The cases referred to in this report give a clear picture of this situation.

91. The Cuban nation, which, in adverse conditions, has managed to cast off much of the dead weight of underdevelopment and now has a literate and skilled population, could, by applying measures such as those proposed, take a step forward towards a productive and creative society in which human rights guarantees are respected in an environment of mutual confidence and social peace.

Annex INOTE VERBALE DATED 27 APRIL 1992 FROM THE PERMANENT REPRESENTATIVE OF CUBA TO THE UNITED NATIONS ADDRESSED TO THE SECRETARY-GENERAL

The Permanent Representative of Cuba presents his compliments to the Secretary-General of the United Nations and has the honour to transmit to him the Cuban Government's legal interpretation of Commission on Human Rights resolution 1992/61.

Cuba, as its authorized representatives have stated, believes that this resolution is the illegitimate offspring of the efforts of the United States Government to interfere in Cuba's internal affairs, seeking new pretexts and complicities for continuing its aggressive policy against Cuba in the current changing conditions of the world, where old "cold war" justifications have no credibility any longer.

In that connection, Cuba has expressed its determination not to accept the illegal and discriminatory treatment that the United States Government is trying to impose on it and in which the latter is trying to involve the United Nations, so that as a result of this firm position it will not implement so much as a single comma of resolution 1992/61 imposed by the United States on the Commission on Human Rights.

This attitude is identical to that taken by Cuba with regard to Commission resolution 1991/68, and is an immutable position of principle, consistent with the Charter of the United Nations and international law.

At the same time, Cuba has declared and reiterates its willingness and desire to continue its cooperation with the United Nations in the field of human rights, as shown not only by the contribution it has always made to the work of the Commission, but also, in respect of our country in particular, by the attention that the Cuban Government devotes to replies under the procedure established under Economic and Social Council resolution 1503 (XLVIII) and to the thematic Rapporteurs, and to contacts with the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

Furthermore, and in addition to the foregoing, operative paragraph 6 of resolution 1992/61, which "Requests the Chairman of the Commission at its forty-eighth session to designate the Special Representative appointed by the Secretary-General pursuant to its resolution 1991/68 as its Special Rapporteur to review and report on the situation of human rights in Cuba", makes it very clear that this is a personal designation of Mr. Rafael Rivas Posada who served as Special Representative of the Secretary-General until the forty-eighth session of the Commission, at which he submitted the report for which he had received a mandate under Commission resolution 1991/68, approved by the Economic and Social Council in decision 1991/252.

The personal designation of Mr. Rafael Rivas Posada as Special Rapporteur is confirmed in operative paragraph 9 of Commission resolution 1992/61, which "Requests the Special Rapporteur to carry out his mandate, including the questions contained in his letter of 6 December 1991 (E/CN.4/1992/27, annex III and appendix), to the Cuban authorities, bearing in mind ...".

In other words, this paragraph refers to the letter sent by Mr. Rivas Posada when he was still serving as Special Representative of the Secretary-General.

It is clear, as regards designation of the Special Rapporteur, that there is no other possible interpretation of the text of resolution 1992/61, and this was recognized by Mr. Rivas Posada himself when, in his letter of 18 March 1992, he informed the Chairman of the Commission of his decision not to accept the appointment as Special Rapporteur on Cuba which, in accordance with resolution 1992/61, would go to him.

Since, pursuant to Commission resolution 1991/68 and Economic and Social Council decision 1991/252, Mr. Rivas Posada's post as Special Representative of the Secretary-General expired at the forty-eighth session of the Commission on Human Rights, and at that time the Commission did not recommend any mandate to continue that post, either in the person of Mr. Rivas Posada or in any other person, it is patently clear that at present there is no legal basis for appointing a new Special Representative of the Secretary-General, and no legal basis for designing any person other than Mr. Rivas Posada as Special Rapporteur.

In the light of the foregoing, it is the legal opinion of Cuba that Commission resolution 1992/61 is in all points inapplicable because Mr. Rivas Posada declined the appointment offered to him therein.

These legal and procedural reasons, along with substantive and political reasons, lead Cuba to reject, with the utmost firmness and determination, the manoeuvres carried out against it by the United States Government which, with unparalleled hypocrisy, used the pretext of human rights and attempted to make the United Nations an accomplice in its methods. Given this situation, my country's energy and determination will not be lacking at any time.

Annex IIOPINION ISSUED BY THE OFFICE OF LEGAL AFFAIRS ON THE INTERPRETATION OF PARAGRAPH 6 OF COMMISSION ON

8. In order to clarify the legal situation thus created, recourse must be had to the terms of resolution 1992/61 in their context and in the light of their object and purpose. While the resolution does not address directly the question of a possible substitution for Mr. Rivas Posada, not only the above-quoted passage, but other provisions of that resolution are relevant in ascertaining the Commission's intentions in adopting the resolution. By paragraph 7, the Commission requested the Special Rapporteur "... to maintain direct contact with the Government and citizens of Cuba, in accordance with resolution 1991/68 and decision 1989/113, concerning the issues and questions contained in and associated with the report of the mission to Cuba as well as the report of the Special Representative". By paragraph 8, the Government of Cuba was urged to cooperate with the Special Rapporteur. Finally, by paragraph 9, the Special Rapporteur was requested to carry out his mandate and to report to the Commission on the results of his endeavours pursuant to the resolution at its forty-ninth session and to submit an interim report to the General-Assembly at its forty-seventh session.

9. The intention of the Commission, therefore, is that the mandate conferred originally on the Secretary-General's Special Representative would be continued by a new Special Rapporteur appointed by the Secretary-General as Special Representative and designated by the Chairman as Special Rapporteur. The Commission decided that the Chairman should, for that purpose, designate the Secretary-General's Special Representative as the Commission's own Special Rapporteur. The operative provisions of the resolution make it clear that the original mandate is to be continued and that reports on the efforts made to carry out that mandate are to be submitted both to the next session of the Commission on Human Rights and the General Assembly.

10. Nothing in the resolution indicates that its object and purpose is limited to Mr. Rivas Posada. It does not refer to him by name. No provision of any of the relevant Commission decisions of which we are aware refers by name to the individual who had been designated "Special Representative". It is the usual practice in the United Nations to consider "Special Representatives" or "Special Rapporteurs" as organs of the body establishing them, in this case the Commission on Human Rights. Absent a different intention expressed by the body establishing the post, the resignation or death of the person holding the post does not, in and of itself, end the mandate. Rather, a new appointment is normally made so that work can continue in fulfilment of the particular mandate, usually in the same manner as prescribed for the initial appointment.

11. To hold in this case that the mandate ended with the resignation of the Special Representative would result in thwarting the Commission's clearly stated intention that the mandate be continued and that reports be submitted on the endeavours made to carry it out. There is no language to support the contention that the mandate was only to be carried out by a particular person.

12. Moreover, the Commission's practice supports the Chairman's position that a replacement should be sought. For example, in 1985, the Commission's Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Chile resigned. The Chairman appointed a successor "following consultations with the members of the Bureau of the Commission and in accordance with established practices" (E/CN.4/1985/41, para. 5).

13. Finally, nothing in resolution 1992/61 indicates that the Commission meant to imply that the designation of a Special Rapporteur would entail that, in future cases, the nomination of a Special Rapporteur would have to be done, not by the Secretary-General, but by reverting to the usual practice. On the contrary, the resolution refers explicitly to the fact that "the Special Representative appointed by the Secretary-General" is designated Special Rapporteur.

14. We agree, therefore, with the Chairman's intention to invite the Secretary-General to designate a new Special Representative and find it to be a logical and correct interpretation of Commission resolution 1992/61. As envisaged by the Chairman, in this case the Secretary-General should be invited to appoint a new Special Representative. Such an appointment should be made in accordance with the procedure set out for the appointment of the initial Special Representative in Commission resolution 1991/68, i.e. "after consultation with the Chairman and the Bureau of the Commission".

15. Once appointed by the Secretary-General, the Special Representative would then, as indicated by the Chairman, be designated the Commission's Special Rapporteur pursuant to its resolution 1992/61.
