FOREWORD

The second regular session of 1991 has seen the introduction of significant changes that will leave a lasting imprint on the Council's methods of work.

These changes, and the innovations that have marked the present session, are the first indication of the success achieved by member States in their recent endeavours to revitalize the Economic and Social Council.

The major innovation at the present session has been the holding of the Special High-level Meeting of the Council, with ministerial participation, on the impact of the recent evolution of East-West relations on the growth of the world economy, in particular, on the economic growth and development of the developing countries, as well as on international economic cooperation.

Both the level of representation and the intensity of the discussions were proof of delegations' interest in this unprecedented session of the Council. That interest could be attributed to the subject of the meeting and the extent of its impact.

The special session ended, as agreed, with a summing-up by its President, Mr. Lakhdar Brahimi, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Algeria. The debate during the session showed the magnitude of the hopes and challenges facing the world community as a result of the recent developments in East-West relations and their impact on the developing world.

Being the first of its kind, the Special High-level Meeting was not a perfect model as far as the organization of its work was concerned. None the less, the experience acquired during the Meeting should prove useful when organizing the ministerial segments of future sessions of the Council, as called for in General Assembly resolution 45/264.

It was precisely with that in mind that an informal meeting of heads of delegation, each accompanied by an adviser, was held in conjunction with the Special High-level Meeting. In the course of that meeting, a number of proposals and suggestions were made with a view to improving both the framework and the functioning of the ministerial segments of future sessions of the Council.

Among the points mentioned in those proposals were the need to facilitate direct contact between delegations on the basis of an unstructured exchange of views and the need to record the outcome of such meetings in documents with more substance than a summary by the President. In that respect, the possibility of adopting a "Declaration by the Council" was mentioned.

The Special High-level Meeting was not the only innovation at the second regular session. The informal exchange of views - a mechanism conceived in the context of the revitalization of the Council, with a view to facilitating interaction and direct dialogue between delegations - made significant headway. Thus, in a series of informal meetings, the Council had a new kind of debate on subjects of major importance. The topics covered included the report of the South Commission, the economic, social and environmental consequences of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait and the strengthening of multilateral cooperation in international economic affairs. During the session, informal discussions were held with the executive secretaries of the regional commissions and the Director-General of the International Monetary Fund.

Pursuant to General Assembly resolution 45/195, the Council held an informal meeting on the report of the South Commission; it was attended by Mr. Julius Nyerere, former President of the United Republic of Tanzania. The personal representatives of the Heads of State or Government of Norway, Venezuela and Senegal also participated. The meeting clarified the challenges confronting the developing world and the developing countries' determination to shoulder their responsibilities in the sphere of development in the context of a healthy international economic environment. There was lengthy discussion of the complementarity between national and international efforts to promote development. In accordance with the mandate entrusted to me, I shall introduce my report on this meeting at the forty-sixth session of the General Assembly.

Pursuant to the provisions of Council decision 1991/211, an informal meeting was held on the economic, social and environmental consequences of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait and its short-, medium- and long-term implications. The meeting not only gave a clearer picture of the impact and scale of the consequences of the Gulf conflict for the countries of the region and for the rest of the world, but also resulted in a better understanding of the special difficulties that the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia is continuing to encounter in the pursuit of its normal activities. It is hoped that adequate means will be placed at the disposal of the Commission to enable it, at this difficult stage in its existence, to discharge its mandate to the benefit of the peoples of that stricken region.

The Council also held an informal exchange of views on another question, which was a priority topic in the general discussion at the present session: the imperative need to strengthen multilateral cooperation in international economic affairs. In view of the provisions of General Assembly resolution 45/264, the general discussion at the present session of the Council was the last of its kind.

At a time of increasing globalization of the world economy and internationalization of markets, it is obvious to everyone that the strengthening of multilateral economic cooperation is more essential than ever, for national efforts alone, however substantial, cannot meet global challenges and cope with the realities of interdependence.

The recent significant changes in international relations as a result of the relaxation of East-West tensions and the ending of the cold war should facilitate the strengthening of multilateral cooperation for development by eliminating recourse to unilateral practices and selective liberalism. If development is indeed the new name for peace, we must ensure that its benefits do not remain the privilege of a few, but become the endowment of all.

The adoption by the General Assembly, at its eighteenth special session, of the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, and, at its forty-fifth session, of the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade are important steps in the right direction. The same is true of the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s.

It remains clear, however, that the credibility of these new instruments of international economic cooperation presupposes the effective implementation of the undertakings entered into, the materialization of the measures agreed upon and the taking of new, action-oriented initiatives. The forthcoming major international meetings, especially the final phase of the Uruguay Round, the eighth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the International Conference on Population and Development, each constitute both an opportunity to build on the agreement that now exists on the revitalization of international economic cooperation and a potential landmark in this common quest for credibility. There is, clearly, a growing convergence of opinion in favour of a development approach based, inter alia, on the role assigned to market signals, the rational use of human, financial and technological resources, improved management of enterprises, the promotion of the spirit of initiative in both the private and the public spheres and the adoption of sound macroeconomic policies. It is beyond doubt that this approach to development can achieve its full potential only in a climate of freedom, democracy, respect for human rights, practical exercise of the right of peoples to self-determination and the broadest possible popular participation in the taking of major decisions. That participation must, of necessity, encompass the disadvantaged, including women. In this context, mention must be made of the Summit on the Economic Advancement of Rural Women, to be held in 1992 in Brussels, under the patronage of Her Majesty Queen Fabiola of Belgium. That meeting will contribute to the preparations now under way for the fourth World Conference on Women, in 1995. The same is true of the international forum on health to be held at Accra in December 1991 under the patronage of Mrs. Rawlings, wife of the President of Ghana.

Turning to the implementation of Council decision 1991/230, it is with pleasure that I learned of the recent decision by the Secretary-General of the United Nations to appoint Mr. Juan O. Somavía, Permanent Representative of Chile to the United Nations, to conduct negotiations on the possibility of convening a world summit for social development. I wish him all possible success in his mission and hope that he will be given all the assistance necessary.

While it is true that development goes hand in hand with greater respect for the basic freedoms, it is also true that the absence of economic growth may seriously jeopardize the future of the emerging experiments in democracy: democracy cannot flourish in an environment marked by spreading destitution and poverty.

In this regard, the growth in the number of developing countries meeting the criteria for inclusion in the list of the least developed countries is cause for serious concern. The report of the Committee for Development Planning on its twenty-seventh session, which will be considered by the General Assembly at its forty-sixth session, has added to that concern. The growth in question is particularly prevalent among the countries of Africa, which already account for two thirds of the States in the least developed category. That fact seems not unconnected with the reaction by the donor community to the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990. The review and final evaluation of that Programme by the General Assembly in September provides the ideal opportunity to adopt the vital corrective measures. In this regard, the decision by the Government of Japan to organize an international conference on development in Africa, to be held in 1993 with the participation of African heads of State, represents a legitimate source of hope.

Generally speaking, the persistence of the external debt crisis, the intensification of the negative transfer of financial resources, the deterioration of terms of trade, the fall in commodity prices and the rise of protectionist pressures, separately and together are the basis of the economic and social decline being experienced by many developing countries.

Moreover, that situation is likely to be aggravated by the combined effects of the slowing of world economic growth and the recession currently affecting the economies of some developed countries. Both economic indicators and statistics are grounds for such concern. The same is true of the state of the international capital market.

In his statement to the Council during the informal exchange of views, the Director-General of the International Monetary Fund gave a detailed analysis of the reasons for the pressures currently being felt in the international capital market. He recommended ways and means of putting a stop to that situation, through an increase in savings.

It is on the basis of similar considerations and their consequences for the development process that the Secretary-General of the United Nations, in his statement at the opening of the present session, suggested the convening of an international conference on development financing. It is encouraging to note that the Council decided to take action on that proposal by inviting the General Assembly to examine it at its forty-sixth session.

Delegations have expressed concern about the scale of financing of emergency humanitarian assistance arising from natural or man-made disasters. The present session of the Council has seen a fruitful debate on the capacity of the United Nations to deal with emergencies.

Although the discussion did not result in the formulation of a common position, general agreement was reached on the need for a timely, coherent and coordinated response by the United Nations system to this type of situation, which, more often than not, is unpredictable.

There was discussion on a number of proposals and suggestions concerning the establishment of a high-level focal point, the strengthening of reserve capacity, respect for state sovereignty and the need to ensure protection for displaced persons. The discussion on these matters will serve as a guide to the Secretary-General in preparing the conclusions and recommendations on this question for submission to the General Assembly at its forty-sixth session.

The best way to strengthen the capacity of the United Nations to respond to the growing scale of human needs arising from emergency situations would be to strengthen, significantly and durably, the means of prevention in the countries concerned. The acceleration of economic and social development is unquestionably one means of prevention. In other words, the improvement, however essential, of the United Nations capacity to respond to emergency humanitarian situations must not lead to neglect of the vital need to strengthen the Organization's action in the economic and social spheres, especially in the developing countries. The objective of that strengthening should be to enable the Organization to meet the changing needs of its Member States more effectively.

Hence, the success of the ongoing process of revitalizing the Economic and Social Council and restructuring the United Nations intergovernmental machinery in the economic and social sectors and related areas is a vital element in the fulfilment of the Organization's mandate. The adoption of General Assembly resolution 45/264 was a notable and decisive step in that process.

The effective and speedy implementation of the bold and innovative measures adopted by the General Assembly at its resumed forty-fifth session will, I am certain, contribute towards improving the prestige and efficiency of the Council by increasing the complementarity between its work and that of the General Assembly and their respective subsidiary bodies. It will also make possible the consolidation of the integrated approach to both policies and programmes concerning economic and social affairs and related fields. That will strengthen the Council's role as the focal point for the review and coordination of major political, economic, social and related matters.

Increasing the complementarity of the activities of the General Assembly and the Council presupposes the restructuring of the subsidiary bodies of these two main organs of the United Nations. The General Assembly is certain to initiate that restructuring at its forty-sixth session.

With reference to the future intensification of the process of restructuring and revitalizing the United Nations in the economic and social spheres, special attention should be paid to the search for greater complementarity between the activities of all the organizations of the United Nations system, including the specialized agencies.

It is gratifying to note the record attendance of heads of specialized agencies at the present session. Their presence has made possible the revival of an old tradition of cooperation between the Council and the specialized agencies on the basis of the relevant provisions of Article 63 of the Charter of the United Nations.

The present session of the Council has culminated in a reversion to practices followed during the very first sessions. I trust that the new model for the organization of the Council's work, introduced in General Assembly resolution 45/264 and applicable as of 1992, will continue to attract similar participation. By making the change, the Council has proved its ability to adapt to changing circumstances. It must now prove its ability to meet its member States' requirements by satisfying the development needs of the overwhelming majority of its membership. The Council can only meet that challenge if it is bolstered by the political will of its members, for it can never be more than its members want it to be.

SPECIAL HIGH-LEVEL MEETING OF THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

1. At its second regular session of 1988, the Council decided, with a view to formulating and elaborating action-oriented recommendations, that it should undertake annually in-depth discussions of major policy themes, to be selected on the basis of a multi-year work programme derived, inter alia, from the priorities set out in the medium-term plan of the United Nations and the work programmes of other relevant United Nations bodies (resolution 1988/77).
2. At its organizational session for 1990, the Council decided that in connection with the major policy theme for 1991, in accordance with paragraph 2 (a) (iii) of Council resolution 1988/77, to discuss as an urgent and emerging issue the following: "The impact of the recent evolution of East-West relations on the growth of the world economy, in particular on the economic growth and development of the developing countries, as well as on international economic cooperation". The Council also decided that the discussion of the theme should be at a special meeting at an appropriately high level, without excluding the ministerial level, which should be held on 4 and 5 July 1991, during its second regular session. The special meeting should be separate from the regular proceedings of the Council and precede its general discussion of international economic and social policy (decision 1990/205).
3. At its second regular session of 1990, the Council, inter alia:
 - (a) Invited the Secretary-General, in consultation with the President of the Council, to take all the necessary measures to ensure the adequate preparation of the special high-level meeting of the Council in 1991, and to prepare an analytical report for that meeting, which should, inter alia, include complete information on matters of trade, financial flows and investments in the context of the recent evolution of East-West relations and its consequences for the developing countries;
 - (b) Invited the President of the Council to convene a one-day preparatory meeting of the Council before the special high-level meeting;
 - (c) Called upon all appropriate organs, organizations, bodies and programmes of the United Nations system to contribute to the success of the special high-level meeting;

20. The Chairman of the Special High-level Meeting made the following concluding statement:

The Special High-level Meeting of the Economic and Social Council is the first meeting of its kind, by reason of the level of representation and the content of the discussion. It was convened in the context of the ongoing process of revitalization and restructuring of the activities of the Council and its subsidiary bodies and of the intergovernmental machinery of the United Nations in the economic and social sectors and related fields.

The importance attached by Member States to this unprecedented event in the annals of the Economic and Social Council is reflected in the high level of representation of delegations. The high-level representation, which includes representation at the ministerial level, is not limited to the delegations of members of the Council alone. In response to General Assembly resolution 45/182, a substantial number of delegations of States not members of the Economic and Social Council elected to be represented at a high level at the Meeting. By their response to the invitation addressed to them, these delegations gave effect to the General Assembly's desire to ensure that this special Meeting is not a gathering limited to States members of the Council but an event of the broadest possible scope in which all Members of the United Nations might participate.

The importance attached by the participants to this Special High-level Meeting has also been reflected in the large number of statements made in the general discussion. Despite time constraints, no fewer than 53 countries made statements during the general discussion. Twenty delegations made their statements at the ministerial level. Eleven international organizations and agencies of the United Nations system also took part in the discussion.

At the opening ceremony, the Secretary-General of the United Nations made a statement.

The discussion was conducted in an atmosphere that helped to create a climate of constructive dialogue. I was impressed by the quality of the statements and the perspicacity of their analysis and vision.

The quality, richness and diversity of the discussion have made it unusually difficult for me to perform the task the Council requires of me to summarize the deliberations.

The statements made by delegations have improved the understanding of the nature and scope of the changes in East-West relations taking place and their implications both for the developing countries and for future international economic cooperation.

All delegations welcomed the evolution of East-West relations, generated by the structural transformation in the USSR and Central and Eastern Europe. They viewed the changes as a favourable development for the parties concerned and for the entire community of nations.

East-West confrontation, which was a lasting feature of the cold war period, has ended, giving an impetus towards the integration of Central and Eastern Europe into the world economy. This is an event of historic importance that could open the way to the emergence of a new spirit of cooperation among nations directed towards the achievement of world peace and equitably shared development. The release for development purposes of financial, technical and human resources hitherto used for military purposes is a further benefit. The anticipated success of the integration of Central and Eastern European countries into the world economy will improve the prospects of those directly concerned as well as those of their partners in both the North and the South.

Delegations noted, however, that the long-term improvement of economic prospects would be the outcome of an extremely difficult, complex and painful period of transition. The many difficulties of the period of transition are now seen to be more acute and serious than they appeared to be in the early stages of the structural reform initiated by the countries of Central and Eastern Europe. The economic and social repercussions of the reforms, in particular the social costs affecting the poorer members of society, as well as the need for safety nets, are evident. There is also a danger of arousing narrow nationalist feelings likely to reopen wounds that were thought to have been healed.

However delicate and difficult the transition may be, all speakers saw it as an inevitable development. During the discussion, several speakers emphasized that the complexity and difficulties of the transition period through which the countries of Central and Eastern Europe were passing were increased by the absence of any model, guidance or historical precedent. As an experiment in progress the experience was unique in modern history. In addition, they rightly emphasized that there was no miracle cure applicable to all situations.

Believing that no serious economic reform can achieve its full potential without appropriate political reform, speakers expressed the hope that the reform process in Central and Eastern Europe, including the USSR, would go hand in hand with the intensification of political reform. Since no democratic process can be pursued in a climate of widespread poverty and destitution, the participants called for a continuation of the efforts currently being made by the industrialized countries and multilateral financial institutions to promote the integration of the Central and Eastern European countries into the world economy. In that context, the need to continue the process of universalizing the multilateral financial agencies was stressed.

Speakers from the Group of 77, for their part, noted that the volume and the speed of implementation of the developed countries' assistance and support measures to integrate the countries of Central and Eastern Europe into the world economy were in contrast to anything the industrialized countries had done for the developing countries.

In that connection, several delegations expressed concern about the short-term risks of diverting the financial resources and trade advantages accorded to the developing countries. According to those delegations, if those risks materialized, they would lead to further marginalization of the developing countries, particularly the least developed among them. The result would be to aggravate the threat of political instability, whose shock waves would be felt far beyond the national borders of the countries concerned.

The same delegations noted the current disparity between the developed countries' diligent response to the financial needs of the Central and Eastern European countries and the persistence - indeed, the worsening - of the net negative transfer of financial resources from the developing to the developed countries. At a time of such exemplary solidarity in respect of Central and Eastern Europe, official development assistance for the developing countries seems to be dwindling in real terms, despite the developing countries' growing needs.

A number of delegations therefore expressed the hope that the disappearance of the "iron curtain" would not result in a curtain of poverty and hunger. They mentioned the need to fulfil the commitments accepted in the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, adopted by the General Assembly at its eighteenth special session, and the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade, adopted at its forty-fifth session. They also recalled the need for speedy implementation of the measures agreed upon in favour of the least developed countries and expressed the hope that the Uruguay Round on multilateral trade negotiations would soon be concluded, with balanced agreement, taking the developing countries' interests into account.

Preparations for the eighth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and for the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development were also mentioned.

During the discussion, representatives of the major donor countries and of multilateral financial institutions reaffirmed that the efforts they were deploying to promote the current reform process in Central and Eastern Europe would not be made at the expense of their programmes of assistance to the developing countries. Delegations of creditor countries cited figures to show that financial flows to the countries of Eastern Europe continue to be modest so far. They noted that the slackening of North-South financial flows, in particular those that did not generate debt, was attributable to the investment climate in recipient countries. The creditor countries also mentioned the new Trinidad debt reduction initiatives being undertaken in favour of low-income developing countries.

On another topic, speakers referred to the human factor and recognized its central role in the development process. They stressed the need to give due attention to human resources development. The development and continuing training of human resources was a precondition for the mobilization and use of financial and natural resources, and for the promotion and transfer of scientific and technical skills essential to lasting development. They believed private enterprise should be allowed to flourish in a climate of freedom, democracy and respect for human rights. While all speakers acknowledged the close link between the development process and democracy, some speakers saw democracy as a sine qua non of the development process, while others stressed that democracy could be exercised only in the context of sustained economic growth.

With regard to the lessons to be drawn from the Council's special Meeting, many delegations, while noting the quality of the statements delivered, had indicated, during the informal exchange of views among heads of delegation prior to the special session, their preference for an exchange of views among delegations on a question-and-answer basis rather than in the traditional pattern of debate. That idea should be considered as part of the follow-up to the provisions of General Assembly resolution 45/264.

The present summary would be incomplete without special reference to the participation of the Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund, the Vice-President of the World Bank, the Director-General of the World Health Organization, the Director-General of the International Labour Organisation, the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the Secretary-General of the International Civil Aviation Organization, the Secretary-General of the International Maritime Organization and the President of the International Fund for Agricultural Development. This is one of the striking aspects of the Meeting. It reflects a spirit of mutual confidence and testifies to what may be regarded as an essential stage in the process of revitalizing the Council.

It should be noted that, despite the understandable differences of opinion, the participants in this Special High-level Meeting have been, throughout their statements, unanimous in recognizing the vast scope of the changes taking place on the international scene. These changes are accompanied by tensions and difficulties, but they also bear a message of hope for the establishment of a world order founded on equity and international solidarity.

It is up to us, the peoples of the world, to reduce those tensions, overcome those difficulties and fulfil that hope. The United Nations, its revitalized Economic and Social Council and the specialized agencies and other international organizations have a primary role to play in that task.

Chapter III

GENERAL DISCUSSION OF INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL POLICY, INCLUDING REGIONAL AND SECTORAL DEVELOPMENTS

1. The Economic and Social Council held a general discussion of international economic and social policy, including regional and sectoral developments, at its second regular session of 1991 (agenda item 2). The President of the Council and the Secretary-General made opening statements at the 16th meeting, on 3 July 1991. The general discussion took place at the 17th to 23rd meetings, from 8 to 11 July; an account of the discussion is contained in the relevant summary records (E/1991/SR.17-23).

2. At its second regular session of 1990, the Council had decided to focus, at its second regular session of 1991, in its general discussion, on the question of strengthening multilateral cooperation in international economic affairs (decision 1990/263).

Opening statements

3. In opening the session, the President noted that it was the first time the Council was conducting a special high-level meeting with ministerial participation. That was in keeping with the revitalization process of the Council and should strengthen its authority, credibility and effectiveness. It augured well for achieving greater complementarity between the work of the Council, the General Assembly and their respective subsidiary bodies.

4. The slow-down of economic growth in the developed countries and the persistence of unfavourable conditions characterizing the international economic environment were inhibiting a resumption of growth and development in the developing countries. Consequently, strengthening multilateral cooperation through dialogue and shared responsibility was more important than ever. That had already been recognized in the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, adopted by the General Assembly at its eighteenth special session. What remained to be done was to translate the intentions into actions, which involved finding a durable solution to the external debt problem, as well as a reversal of the net negative transfer of resources to developing countries. Equally important was the successful conclusion of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations, considering the vital and dynamic role of international trade for the world economy. The issue of multilateral cooperation was particularly evident in the linkage of environment and development. The forthcoming United Nations Conference on Environment and Development was increasingly taking on the character of a world summit: a testimony to the importance attached to it by Governments.

5. With the passing of ideological differences and the end of the cold war, there was hope of mustering international cooperation for the promotion of growth and development and stability and peace. The integration of Central and Eastern Europe in the world economy had mobilized the efforts of the international community. What was needed now was a similar effort for the resumption of growth in the developing countries; otherwise, the distortions characterizing international economic relations would worsen. That was particularly true in Africa, where the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development had not lived up to expectations. Africa had too long been the forgotten continent. But cooperation between developing countries could contribute substantially. The report of the South Commission had shown the importance of South-South cooperation. There were many obstacles to such cooperation but progress had been made in a number of regions in the South. The potential was enormous and subregional as well as regional integration could provide new opportunities for North-South cooperation and dialogue.

6. In his address to the Council, the Secretary-General said that the activities of the United Nations in achieving peace and security could not be divorced from its responsibility to promote better living conditions in all parts of the world. Large numbers of people were living barely at subsistence levels and more than 1 billion lived in absolute poverty.

7. During the past 20 years, capital formation and economic development had been hampered by a combination of negative external factors and adverse internal conditions. Capital requirements had steadily increased, but world economic growth had been slowing down for a number of years, causing a continuing deterioration of the relative position of the developing countries in the world economy.

8. To overcome the financial and development crises of the 1980s in the developing countries, increased trade and foreign investment flows were essential. Many developing countries were eliminating stringent regulation of foreign investors and shifting to more outward-oriented development strategies so as to attract financial flows. Privatization and deregulation had become widespread, reflecting the ideological changes taking place throughout the world with respect to the role Government should play in managing the economy.

9. But worsening economic trends and the lack of international finance had made restructuring in the developing countries and in Central and Eastern Europe a slow and difficult process. A supportive international economic environment was crucial for the reform process. Weak export markets, the debt burden and a deteriorating physical and social infrastructure had contributed to an inhospitable climate for investment in many countries.

10. The creation of a truly liberal international trading system was essential for the reactivation of economic growth and development in the developing countries. To that end, a successful completion of the Uruguay Round was of the utmost importance. Equally important for activating the economies of the developing countries, particularly in Africa and Latin America, was the speedy implementation of bold and imaginative solutions to the debt problem. Recent initiatives, such as the Trinidad and Tobago terms, the Netherlands initiative and the initiative of President Bush, constituted positive developments but, in order to resolve this critical issue, comprehensive, pragmatic and long-lasting measures were needed. Precedents could be found in the decisions of the Paris Club regarding the write-off of large parts of the foreign debts of Egypt and Poland.

11. The crisis on the African continent was particularly worrisome. For a large majority of Africans, living conditions had continued to deteriorate. Unless urgent measures were taken, over half the population of Africa could be expected to live below the poverty level by the year 2000. Despite the serious reform efforts undertaken by African countries following the adoption of the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development, economic growth had not been reactivated. In fact, more African countries had joined the ranks of the least developed countries, suggesting that support by the international community for the efforts of the African countries had been insufficient.

12. Also of great concern was the fact that the number of refugees and displaced persons had increased dramatically over the past decade. Many complex emergency situations had arisen, making it essential to enhance the capacity of the United Nations system to provide humanitarian emergency assistance in a speedy and effective manner.

13. Although the world as a whole had weathered the initial shocks of the Gulf crisis, many developing countries and hundreds of thousands of migrant workers continued to suffer. The invasion of Kuwait by Iraq had caused massive destruction of economic, social and physical infrastructure, unprecedented environmental damage and untold human suffering, much of which was still continuing.

14. As new and competing claims for resources had emerged, the availability of increased resources had become increasingly critical to prospects for growth and development. Without the greater availability of resources, the ongoing processes of political and economic transformation would be at risk. If the international community failed to find adequate resources to finance global development, peace and security would be severely jeopardized. Consideration should be given to the convening of an international conference on development financing.

General discussion

15. Most delegations referred to the World Economic Survey, 1991, and noted with concern that world economic growth had slowed down for the second year in a row, falling to 1 per cent, well below world population growth. In the developing countries, the growth rate had slowed down further for the third consecutive year, to about 3 per cent, as compared to 3.4 per cent in 1989 and almost 5 per cent in 1988. Economic activity had sharply contracted in Eastern Europe and the USSR in 1990, declining by 11 per cent in the former and by 4 per cent in the latter. In contrast to the robust growth in 1989, the developed market economies saw their growth rate reduced by 1 per cent in 1990 and, by the end of that year, almost all the major economies were in or near recession.

16. While the developing countries faced similar problems of entrenched poverty, vulnerability to changing international economic conditions, heavy indebtedness and a considerable gap in science and technology vis-à-vis the industrialized countries, significant divergences in performance and specific regional difficulties were noted by many participants. That was particularly apparent in the discussion held with the Executive Secretaries of the regional commissions. In Africa and Latin America and the Caribbean, the 1980s had been a lost decade for development. Economic prospects had not improved to any significant extent in the 1990s and major national and international efforts were still required to attain sustained growth. In Western Asia, a major reconstruction effort was required after the conflicts of the 1980s and early 1990s. The region had vast energy resources, but they had to be used for development purposes and to cope with several deep social problems, in particular the plight of the poor and the unemployed. In Europe, attention had turned to the political and economic reforms in the East. Major efforts were being made to smooth the transition process and to integrate Central and Eastern Europe in the international economy. In South and East Asia and the Pacific, the issue was one of maintaining the momentum achieved in recent years. The Asian and Pacific economies were gradually being integrated. Growth, intensification of trade, foreign investment and transfer of technology from neighbouring countries were transforming the region. Yet, further policy efforts were needed to reinforce those positive developments.

Strengthening multilateral cooperation in international economic affairs

17. All delegations were committed to strengthening multilateral cooperation in international economic affairs, the main theme of the general discussion. The theme was particularly pertinent in view of the dramatic political and economic changes that had taken place. Those changes bode well for the future and offer opportunities for expanded cooperation.

18. Delegations recognized that the actions of individual countries, however important they might be, could not by themselves meet the current global challenges. In an increasingly interdependent world, with the globalization of the world economy and the internationalization of markets, the case for multilateral cooperation was stronger than ever. Multilateral cooperation involved States, agencies and institutions, as well as non-governmental organizations, which traditionally had not held such responsibilities. Therefore, the importance of the role of the Economic and Social Council as the central body for coordination, consultation and guidance was stressed.

19. Many delegations considered that the adoption by the General Assembly at its eighteenth special session of the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, together with the launching of the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade, represented important steps towards reviving international economic cooperation. The same held true for the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s.

20. However, it was also noted that the 1980s had witnessed a retreat from multilateralism and that, despite the adoption of the Declaration and the International Development Strategy, there was little evidence that they were being effectively implemented. Therefore, it was important that all Member States respect their commitments to those new instruments of international cooperation through the adoption of practical measures and action-oriented initiatives.

21. Most delegations stressed that strengthening multilateral cooperation was more necessary than ever to combat the spread of hunger and extreme poverty, as well as the scourge of drug abuse and trafficking. Equally important in that respect were the development of human resources and the promotion of science and technology for development.

Revitalization of the Council

22. Many delegations spoke about the revitalization of the Economic and Social Council. Many referred to the progress achieved in the political arena but said that much frustration remained in furthering international cooperation with regard to economic and social issues.

23. The Special High-level Meeting of the Economic and Social Council, with ministerial participation, which had preceded the general discussion, as well as the informal exchange of views on the report of the South Commission (for the report of the President of the Council on the informal exchange of views on the report of the South Commission, see A/46/448) and the exchanges of views on the economic, social and environmental consequences of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait and on strengthening multilateral cooperation in international economic affairs were described as important steps towards making the Council more relevant and responsive to the needs and expectations of delegations. In particular, the Special High-level Meeting had shown that effective revitalization of the Council was possible and that similar approaches to the consideration of global issues were required in the future.

24. Restructuring and revitalization efforts should be designed to make the United Nations more capable of meeting the changing and evolving needs of its Member States, particularly the developing countries. The Nordic project was referred to as deserving in-depth study.

East-West relations

25. Although the Special High-level Meeting had dealt in depth with the recent evolution in East-West relations, many delegations referred to the historic and momentous changes that had taken place in the conduct of those relations. It was pointed out by some that the marked improvement in those relations offered an opportunity for strengthening and intensifying multilateral cooperation. Others expressed the fear that developing countries could become further marginalized as the international community became increasingly preoccupied with the developments in Central and Eastern Europe.

26. A number of delegations pointed to the possibility of reducing military expenditures in developed and developing countries alike. The end of the cold war should allow human, financial and technical resources to be released for the benefit of international cooperation and should also place the United Nations in a better position to fulfil its mandate to preserve international peace and security.

The Gulf crisis

27. Optimistic assessments in early 1990 had been considerably tempered, if not dashed, by the Gulf crisis, which had seriously worsened world economic prospects. It had intensified economic difficulties, deepened the recession in a number of countries and caused severe economic disruptions. Millions of people had been displaced, environmental degradation of unprecedented proportions had occurred and the need for reconstruction in the affected countries was immense. The crisis had caused major hardships for oil-importing developing countries; the least developed countries had been the most severely affected.

28. A number of delegations noted the consequences of the Gulf crisis for international capital markets. These included an increasing upward pressure on real interest rates, which could lead to a further worsening of the already heavy debt burdens of many developing countries. The Gulf crisis had also emphasized the volatility of oil markets. Consequently, some speakers welcomed the recent initiatives to establish a dialogue between oil-producing and oil-consuming countries, most notably the ministerial conference held in Paris on 1 and 2 July 1991.

External debt and resource transfers

29. The problem of the external indebtedness of the developing countries was referred to as a major obstacle to the resumption of economic growth which continued to inhibit investments in those countries. Although many speakers acknowledged that there had been significant developments in official debt reductions, on the whole, progress had been slow and actual debt reductions had accomplished little in improving the balance of payments of affected countries. Virtually all debtor countries welcomed the Brady initiative, but many noted that it had not had the expected impact because of the scarcity of resources to implement meaningful debt reduction packages and insufficient coordination among those involved. Some delegations referred positively to recent developments regarding debt reductions, such as the Trinidad and Tobago terms, the Netherlands initiative, and the Enterprise for the Americas initiative.

30. High debt levels continued to extract a large amount of financial resources from developing countries. Net financial transfers of capital-importing developing countries to the developed countries had reached $US 32 billion in 1990, according to the World Economic Survey, 1991. Many delegations expressed serious concern about that situation. A positive transfer to the developing countries was urgently needed.

31. A number of delegations reiterated their commitments to the internationally agreed targets for official development assistance (ODA). It was widely held that, particularly for the least developed countries, such aid was an indispensable source of finance. Marginalization of those countries should be avoided. The donor community had a major role to play in channelling aid to them. The Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s was seen as an important step in the right direction. In that connection, a few delegations expressed concern about the recommendation in the report of the Committee for Development Planning on the criteria for identifying the least developed countries.

32. On the general issue of financing for development, several delegations supported the proposal made by the Secretary-General in his opening statement that consideration be given to the convening of an international conference on development financing.

International trade

33. The multilateral trading system, according to a number of representatives, was not working satisfactorily. Considerable ambivalence was expressed regarding bloc formation, which could be seen as a way of expanding trade opportunities but could also be viewed as an expression of general dissatisfaction with the system. Some speakers noted that in developed countries new forms of protectionism and lack of transparency in trade policies or measures were effectively inhibiting exports from developing countries. They emphasized that, as a result of protectionist measures, developing countries were suffering losses of earnings representing twice the amount of ODA. Protectionist trends were particularly disturbing as an increasing number of developing countries saw openness as an important step towards increased efficiency and modernization.

34. Delegations expressed the hope that the Uruguay Round would be brought to a speedy conclusion. Many were seriously concerned that the negotiations of the Uruguay Round at the ministerial meeting in December 1991 could fail. However, if that round of multilateral trade negotiations were to culminate in balanced results that took the interests of all into account, it would greatly strengthen the multilateral trading system to the benefit of all countries.

35. Several delegations noted that the strengthening of the trading system was also dependent on improving the terms of trade and on halting the decline in commodity prices. Non-fuel primary commodity prices had not only weakened in 1990, but on average had reached their lowest level in real terms since 1945. There was a need to diversify exports in the case of primary exporters, which required appropriate national strategies supported by international cooperation and more liberal access to the markets of developed countries.

Environment

36. Delegations welcomed the universal recognition of the inextricable link between environment and development. Preserving environmental quality was in the interest of all countries. For example, the disaster at the nuclear power plant at Chernobyl had shown the global scope of environmental repercussions, calling for concerted international action and cooperation.

37. Many delegations noted that environment and development were not irreconcilable but were in fact complementary. That was particularly the case in Africa, where trends towards desertification and soil erosion were undermining food production and exacerbating hunger.

38. It was recognized that the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, to be held at Rio de Janeiro in June 1992, would constitute a landmark in the annals of multilateral cooperation and should result in the adoption of binding agreements. However, some delegations noted that such agreements should take into account the specific needs of the developing countries, notably in the areas of transfer of technology and financial resources. Some delegations observed that the eighth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, to be held at Cartagena, Colombia, in February 1992, could also make a major contribution to the promotion of sustainable economic development.

Convergence of views

39. Many speakers acknowledged that the agreements reached at recent international meetings had been made possible by a convergence of views on an approach to development that was based, inter alia, on increasing reliance on market signals, the rational use of human, financial and technical resources, the decentralization of economic decision-making processes, the establishment of an environment in which entrepreneurial initiatives could flourish and the adoption of sound macroeconomic policies.

40. A number of speakers also noted that such an approach to development could achieve its full potential only within an environment of democracy, good governance, political freedom, pluralism, respect for human rights and the broadest possible participation in the adoption of major decisions. In that regard, several delegations referred to the report of the South Commission and welcomed its recommendations, many of which called for introspection. Similar self-examination by the countries of the North might also be in order. Furthermore, it should be possible for the progress achieved in national democratic processes to be consolidated through the democratization of international relations. In that connection, several delegations called for a broadening of the process of decision-making on macroeconomic policies having a world-wide scope in order to achieve better coordination at the global level.

41. It was more widely agreed than in the past that there was a need for domestic policies that would mobilize and make rational use of all potential resources, as well as for a favourable international economic environment and adequate external support for national development efforts.

42. Statements were made during the general discussion by the representatives of the Netherlands (on behalf of the States Members of the United Nations that are members of the European Economic Community), Brazil, Thailand, Algeria, Zambia, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Tunisia, China, Finland (on behalf of the Nordic countries), Czechoslovakia, the Bahamas, Mexico, Indonesia, Austria, Argentina, Chile, Romania, Japan, Yugoslavia, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Jamaica, Bulgaria, Morocco, Botswana, the United States of America, Ecuador, Malaysia, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Turkey, Bahrain, Peru and Kenya.

43. Statements were also made by the observers for Ghana (on behalf of the States Members of the United Nations that are members of the Group of 77), the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Viet Nam, the Republic of Korea, Malawi, Venezuela, Egypt, Australia, Ethiopia, Sri Lanka, Senegal, Cuba and Bangladesh.

44. The Under-Secretaries-General for International Economic and Social Affairs and for Technical Cooperation for Development made statements.

45. Statements were made by the Executive Secretaries of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, the Economic Commission for Africa, the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia, the Economic Commission for Europe and the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean.

46. A statement was also made by the Executive Director of the United Nations Population Fund.

47. Statements were made by the representative of the International Labour Organisation, the Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund, the Director-General of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the Deputy Director-General of the World Health Organization and representatives of the International Telecommunication Union, the International Fund for Agricultural Development and the World Bank.

"Recalling General Assembly resolution 2625 (XXV) of 24 October 1970, containing the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations,

"Reaffirming the right of every State to freely determine its own political, economic and social system without any external interference, and the obligation of all States to refrain from adopting any economic reprisal or embargo and to prevent the use of corporations under its jurisdiction and control as instruments of political pressure or coercion against another State, in violation of the Charter of the United Nations,

"Requests the Commission on Human Rights, at its forty-eighth session, to consider, as a matter of priority, the adverse effects which the embargo and other related measures taken against the Republic of Cuba by the Government of the United States of America have on the full enjoyment by the Cuban people of their inalienable human rights."

RESPONSE OF THE UNITED NATIONS TO EMERGENCIES: SUMMARY PREPARED BY THE CHAI MAN OF THE THIRD (PROGRAMME AND COORDINATION) COMMITTEE

From 8 to 11 July 1991, the Third (Programme and Coordination) Committee held a timely and constructive discussion on the response of the United Nations to emergencies, with the active participation of delegations and leading representatives of the programmes and organizations concerned both within and outside the United Nations system. The discussion not only deepened participants' understanding of the different aspects of the response of the international community to emergencies but also identified a number of areas in which concrete measures could be taken to strengthen the effectiveness of action by the United Nations system.

A summary of the discussion cannot do justice to the richness of the exchanges that took place, nor can it be exhaustive. At the forty-sixth session of the General Assembly, delegations will have the opportunity to elaborate further on the issues discussed. However, several broad preliminary considerations can be highlighted.

The number of emergencies, both man-made and natural, leading to death, devastation and the uprooting of an unprecedented number of people has been increasing recently. Many of these emergencies are complex and protracted, often affecting a number of countries simultaneously. Most of them have occurred in the developing countries. This points up the underlying crisis in development that has made these countries particularly vulnerable. Many emergencies have their root causes in poverty and environmental degradation. Others are the result of civil or international conflicts. Still others result from a combination of these factors.

Comprehensive solutions to sudden and complex emergencies require the active involvement of the United Nations system, the disaster-stricken countries themselves, donors and governmental and non-governmental organizations. All parties should share a common objective, namely to save lives and alleviate the suffering of the people affected, not least the great number of refugees. To achieve that objective, all parties must work in a spirit of partnership and with a deep sense of responsibility. The United Nations and its specialized agencies are in a unique position to address both the political and the developmental causes of emergencies, to mobilize efforts to prevent emergencies and to respond to them when they occur. The capacity of the Secretary-General to provide leadership in this regard should therefore be strengthened.

The United Nations should be able to mobilize the international community to provide a swift and effective response to all emergencies. To that end, the many suggestions made during the discussion can be summarized under four headings: prevention; preparedness; coordination and cooperation; and the relationship between emergency relief and development.

Prevention

Greater attention should be paid to addressing the root causes of emergencies to prevent them from occurring. This applies to the need both to support development efforts and to take the underlying political problems into account. Recent international developments provide a unique opportunity for the United Nations to facilitate solutions to regional conflicts, which can lead to large-scale destruction and massive movements of people. At the same time, the growing number of local conflicts which are often ethnic in nature and can have similar repercussions, poses new and serious problems.

One important component of preventive capacity is early warning of impending disasters. The United Nations system should continue to improve its capacity to collect, analyse and disseminate information.

Preparedness

There was general agreement that different components of the international community should be mobilized effectively for concerted responses to emergencies. To that end, the United Nations system should strengthen its collective stand-by capacity. Mobilization of the resources of national Governments and institutions and of non-governmental organizations should be ensured. A collective stand-by capacity, drawing upon the existing experience and expertise of the organizations concerned, is central to a prompt response to emergencies.

An essential element of a stand-by capacity is the availability of the financial resources required. During the discussion, support was expressed for a central revolving emergency fund under the authority of the Secretary-General. A stand-by capacity also requires adequate pre-positioned supplies, logistical arrangements and people with the necessary expertise. For this purpose, computerized inventories of supplies and personnel, both within and outside the system, are required.

Training of staff involved in emergency responses, efforts to establish common emergency management procedures and programming for training of government personnel in disaster-prone developing countries were welcome developments and should be intensified.

Coordination and cooperation

It is essential to develop an international humanitarian partnership based on a clear and effective division of responsibility involving the countries affected, organizations of the United Nations system, donor Governments, the International Committee of the Red Cross, the International Organization for Migration and the non-governmental organizations concerned, in particular the League of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies. The United Nations - apart from mobilizing effectively the relief capacity of the United Nations system - should perform a leadership role in establishing a framework for the concerted efforts of the entire international community. Existing capabilities should be used to the full.

The leadership of the Secretary-General is critical for the effective coordination of emergency responses. In the view of several delegations, the Secretary-General should be assisted by a high-ranking official working closely with him on emergency prevention and response. That official should assist the Secretary-General in ensuring that the whole range of actions - political, humanitarian and developmental - reinforce each other and, in close cooperation with the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Coordinator (UNDRO) and other organizations concerned, should ensure the joint assessment needs, system-wide plans of action, joint appeals and the provisions of consolidated information. Such an arrangement should in no way undermine the role and responsibility of the operational agencies. On the contrary, a strong leadership function should facilitate a swift and efficient response by the various agencies and entities concerned. Several other delegations questioned the desirability of such an arrangement. They were of the opinion that the matter should be further examined.

The need for appropriate inter-agency consultations to draw up action plans and coordinate the assistance efforts of organizations of the system was pointed out by many participants in the discussion. The International Committee of the Red Cross, the League of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies and the International Organization for Migration should be invited to participate in such consultations. Close cooperation with relevant non-governmental organizations should be maintained. As appropriate, ad hoc consultations among all concerned, including the Governments affected and donors, should be organized.

The United Nations response to emergencies should make cooperation with the host Government a central tenet. At the country level, a single senior official, designated by the Secretary-General, should lead and coordinate the system's emergency support for host Governments. This official should also be responsible for bringing the United Nations reconstruction and development capacity to bear on emergency problems. The role of the United Nations resident coordinator system is critical in providing consolidated support to host Governments in emergencies.

Emergency relief and development

Disasters and emergencies have seriously disrupted the already fragile development process in developing countries. In most instances, it is beyond the capacity of these countries to sustain a lasting solution to problems arising from major emergencies. The need for a smooth transition from relief to rehabilitation and development was emphasized. This is particularly important, given the limited resources available to the United Nations system for both humanitarian and development assistance. Several countries stressed the need for additional resources for these purposes. Sufficient levels of assistance and the complementarity between disaster relief efforts and development programmes, particularly for protracted and slow-moving emergencies, should be ensured. It was noted that emergency relief should not divert attention from other pressing development needs.

Conclusion

The many imminent emergency situations in the world constitute a moral and humanitarian challenge for the international community. The United Nations has an opportunity to play a leading role in bringing about relief and better living conditions for millions of people in distress. Many participants in the discussion emphasized the importance of addressing the needs of internally displaced persons effectively. If the United Nations can develop an adequate and viable response mechanism for emergencies and mobilize substantial resources for relief, it will have taken an important step in dealing with the major issues of poverty, disease and environmental degradation. This is a challenge that goes to the core of proving that multilateralism and the United Nations work. The spirit of teamwork that characterized the discussion, in which Governments, organizations of the United Nations system and other organizations participated, augurs well for the future. This discussion should provide a firm basis for action, which, in the end, is what really counts.

OPERATIONAL ACTIVITIES FOR DEVELOPMENT: SUMMARY PREPARED BY THE VICE-CHAIRMAN OF THE THIRD (PROGRAMME AND COORDINATION) COMMITTEE

Current issues with respect to operational activities for development were discussed in the Third (Programme and Coordination) Committee from 17 to 19 July, with the active participation of a number of delegations and representatives of programmes and organizations of the United Nations system. The discussion took place at the mid-point between the adoption of General Assembly resolution 44/211 in 1989 and the comprehensive, triennial policy review of operational activities for development in 1992. It thus gave the participants an opportunity to assess the progress made in the reform of the operational activities of the United Nations system and to delineate some of the key areas in which further improvements were needed.

Need for a consensus resolution

The discussion covered a wide range of subjects. Delegations expressed the hope that a summary of the discussion would facilitate consideration of the item at the forty-sixth session of the General Assembly and that a consensus would be reached on a resolution on operational activities for development. That would help maintain the momentum of the reforms recommended by the General Assembly in resolution 44/211 and could provide elements for the comprehensive policy review in 1992. The "facilitator" of the negotiations on the subject at the forty-fifth session of the Assembly suggested that one might take as a starting-point in 1991 issues on which a large measure of agreement had been reached in 1990. He also offered some ideas on three key issues on which agreement was not possible: resources and funding; programming (the integrated operational response of the United Nations system); and human rights and democratic government.

Difficulties facing developing countries

The economic difficulties facing many developing countries were reviewed. Reference was made to population pressures in a stagnating economic environment, which have led to increased poverty and hunger, an increase in the number of refugees and displaced persons and a rise in such other problems as AIDS. The role and effectiveness of operational activities in contributing to the solution of these and other critical problems were discussed.

Reference was also made to a number of key international strategies, adopted during the past year by the international community, which provide a general framework for mobilizing the operational activities of the United Nations system in a common and coherent effort (the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade, the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s and the Plan of Action for Implementing the World Declaration on the Survival, Protection and Development of Children in the 1990s). A major focus of operational activities of the United Nations system should now be to translate these international objectives into concrete action, in full accord with the priorities of each country, in order to make a real impact on their development.

Resources and funding

The question of resources was discussed in the light of the information provided by the Director-General for Development and International Economic Cooperation in his 1991 annual report (A/46/206-E/1991/93 and Add.1-3) and with reference to the growing needs of the developing countries. In order to discharge its responsibilities, the United Nations system should be provided with the necessary financial support. Reference was made to the need for increased levels of development finance through official development assistance (ODA) and the importance of all industrialized countries reaching the target for ODA of 0.7 per cent of their gross national product (GNP). Some delegations indicated that the funding of operational activities was not likely to increase significantly in the near future.

Reform issues

Delegations noted that the development needs of developing countries, the role of the operational activities of the United Nations system in revitalizing the development process of developing countries and the need for the United Nations system to achieve maximum efficiency and effectiveness in meeting the varying requirements of developing countries made it essential to press forward with the reform of operational activities on the basis of General Assembly resolution 44/211. A number of delegations noted that the resolution reaffirmed the fundamental characteristics of the operational activities of the United Nations system, including the system's neutrality and multilateral character. Ideas for reforming the United Nations system's operational arm were presented and several delegations referred to some of the suggestions emanating from the Nordic project, including questions relating to governance. There was broad support for multilateralism.

Human development

In expressing support for the concept of human development as an essential dimension of development and of the operational activities of the United Nations system, delegations noted that the Human Development Report of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) constituted an important and valuable contribution to the thinking and debate on the subject. The Report has shown that sustainable development is possible in relatively low GNP per capita contexts. While supporting the human development focus, some delegations expressed concern about the inclusion of the human freedom index in the 1991 Report. Other delegations noted that the indexes included in the Report needed to be refined and modified and that the Report was a new tool in the dialogue between the United Nations system and individual countries.

Assessment of the implementation of General Assembly resolution 44/211

The 1991 annual report of the Director-General was found to be comprehensive, factual, informative and useful, although some delegations would have preferred it to contain more concrete proposals and to result in action, particularly with respect to the strengthening of the United Nations system at the field level. According to those delegations, the general tone of the report tended to be too positive as far as the implementation of General Assembly resolution 44/211 was concerned. A number of delegations noted with satisfaction the specific steps taken by the United Nations system, as reported by the Director-General, to strengthen the resident coordinator system, to improve collaboration in the programming of operational activities, to enhance the use of national capacities and extend the modality of national execution, to reorganize headquarters and field structures, to seek greater delegation to the field and to share premises at the country level. It was broadly recognized that the comprehensive policy review in 1992 represented a crucial step in assessing the progress made in implementing General Assembly resolution 44/211. It was noted that, in accordance with paragraph 34 of the resolution, the Director-General was expected to submit to the General Assembly at its forty-seventh session a comprehensive analysis of the implementation of the resolution and to make appropriate recommendations. Delegations pointed out that the Director-General should be provided with the resources necessary to undertake the many tasks assigned to him. It was suggested that he submit, in the third quarter of 1991, detailed proposals containing the subjects to be covered by the review, its schedule and the estimated cost.

National execution

A number of ideas were expressed concerning the fuller use and the strengthening of national capacities and national execution. The modality was viewed as an important factor in achieving self-reliance. Delegations noted the progress reported by the Director-General; in particular, they noted that for the United Nations Children's Fund and the World Food Programme national execution was the norm, and that the United Nations Population Fund was making rapid progress. They also recognized that the application of this modality in UNDP programmes was increasing, and that it would be further facilitated in the light of decision 91/27 adopted by the Governing Council of UNDP at its thirty-eighth session, in June 1991. In the extension of this modality, country-specific capacities should be borne in mind; a gradual approach may be required and the further strengthening of national institutions. It was noted that the strengthening of national capacity might best take place at the programme level.

Harmonization and simplification of rules and procedures

A number of delegations called for further progress in the harmonization and simplification of rules and procedures of operational activities of the United Nations system and their better adaptation to the requirements of developing countries. Such progress would enhance collaboration of the United Nations system at the country level and facilitate the fuller utilization of national capacities in all aspects of the programming processes and project cycles of operational activities.

Support cost successor arrangements

According to delegations and organizations of the United Nations system, the recently approved successor arrangements for support costs for UNDP- and UNFPA-supported projects, together with the enhancement of national execution and a programme-oriented approach, will have a profound impact on the way in which future operational activities will be carried out. Views were expressed about the need for flexibility and appropriate transitional arrangements in the implementation of these new arrangements. The funding for technical support for national execution was noted. Reference was made to the provision under the new arrangement, by which the resident coordinators would provide leadership in building up national-level multidisciplinary teams in order to respond better to multidisciplinary development problems and to foster a team approach to national capacity-building. As to the provision of administration and operational support services, it was suggested that a study could be commissioned by the Director-General to review existing modalities of the United Nations system in order to determine the most cost-effective ways of providing such support. Approval of successor support cost arrangements for UNFPA, as set out in decision 91/37 of the Governing Council of UNDP, was noted, including the establishment of multidisciplinary teams. In the implementation of that decision, consultations with various parties, including the Economic Commission for Africa, were foreseen in the near future, as requested in the decision.

Resident coordinator system

In a number of statements reference was made to the effective functioning of the resident coordinator system as a means of ensuring improved coherence and effectiveness of the United Nations system at the country level. The importance of monitoring the application of the new guidelines for the strengthening of the resident coordinator system was emphasized. Reference was also made to the need for greater decentralization of the system to the country level.

Common programming response by the United Nations system

Programming issues were raised by a number of delegations in connection with General Assembly resolution 44/211 and the 1991 annual report of the Director-General. The view was expressed that the report did not contain any meaningful reference to the integrated operational response of the United Nations system in accordance with paragraph 17 (g) of the resolution. On the question of a national programming framework, it was indicated that there were still divergent views and approaches on how best to achieve greater coherence of a multifaceted United Nations system at the country level, comprising organizations and programmes with specialized mandates and one programme with a broad multisectoral mandate. It was noted that a set of draft guidelines on enhancing the programming processes was issued by the Director-General on the basis of the work of the Consultative Committee on Substantive Questions (Operational Activities), and that the synchronization of various programming cycles with those of Governments was proceeding under the aegis of the Joint Consultative Group on Policy. The monitoring of these arrangements and other aspects of Assembly resolution 44/211 by the Office of the Director-General through country profiles was also noted. Mention was made of the conclusion in the annual report that there was a trend towards greater substantive collaboration in programming areas among United Nations organizations, despite the lack of national programme frameworks in some countries. It was suggested that it might be useful to test the idea of a simple country statement by the United Nations system in interested countries, building on existing experience.

Field representation

The preliminary information on the field network of the United Nations system provided in the annual report of the Director-General, in accordance with paragraphs 15 and 16 of Assembly resolution 44/211, was found useful. However, a number of delegations considered it important that the subject be pursued further in the context of achieving more substantive field-level cooperation and enhancing the functioning of the resident coordinator system. In future work on the subject, account should be taken of decisions of intergovernmental bodies of the United Nations system on field structures, including the decisions on support cost successor arrangements, which would ensure that the provision of analytical and technical support at the country level would be based on local requirements. Representatives of organizations of the United Nations system referred to various reviews undertaken by their organizations to achieve greater decentralization and improved technical support services.

Training support

A number of delegations and representatives of organizations of the United Nations system referred to the new training support initiatives as a promising means of fostering United Nations country teams.

World Food Programme

It was noted that the World Food Programme (WFP) intended to prepare a study for 1992 on improving the integration of non-emergency food aid with development resources. The consensus on the governance of WFP and the Headquarters agreement recently signed between the Government of Italy, WFP, the United Nations and the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) was welcomed.

Women in development

A number of delegations participated in the discussion of the question of women in development, which was analysed in the annual report of the Director-General in accordance with General Assembly resolution 44/171. The view was expressed in the report that much remained to be done to integrate women in development issues in mainstream terms. The continuation of support for specific women in development activities was widely endorsed. Although the information contained in the annual report was found to be useful, and the steps proposed were supported, a few delegations found the proposals too general to be of immediate use in strengthening the women in development dimension in operational activities.

Entrepreneurship

The issue of entrepreneurship, included in the annual report in accordance with General Assembly resolution 45/188, was discussed by a number of delegations. Some delegations referred to the new emerging needs in that area in their countries and to the useful role the United Nations system could play in the transitional phase. While some delegations wondered whether there was a need to refine the United Nations system's work in the area, as proposed in the annual report, others agreed that there was scope for improved coordination and expressed support for the goals and proposals outlined by the Director-General.

Development cooperation in Eastern Europe

A number of countries welcomed decision 91/24 of the Governing Council of UNDP on technical cooperation in the transformation of Eastern European economies. Several delegations also commended the United Nations Children's Fund and its Executive Board for work carried out by the organization on behalf of children in Eastern Europe.

Technical cooperation among developing countries

The recent session of the High-level Committee on the Review of Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries was referred to, and the hope was expressed that in future better use might be made of various resources available from developing countries, including technology.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND ENVIRONMENTAL CONSEQUENCES OF THE SITUATION BETWEEN IRAQ AND KUWAIT AND ITS SHORT-, MEDIUM- AND LONG-TERM IMPLICATIONS

At its organizational session for 1991, the Economic and Social Council decided to hold, at its second regular session of 1991, an informal exchange of views on the economic, social and environmental consequences of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait and its short-, medium- and long-term implications; to request the Secretary-General, in consultation with the relevant organizations of the United Nations system, to provide appropriate documentation for the discussion of the question; and to invite the executive heads of the relevant organizations of the United Nations system to participate in the discussion (decision 1991/211).

Proceedings of the informal exchange of views

The Council held the informal exchange of views on 12 July. It had before it the following documents:

- (b) Note by the Secretariat on the question (E/1991/102).

The panelists for the morning meeting, which dealt with the economic and social consequences of the situation, were the following: Mr. Tayseer Abdel Jaber, Executive Secretary, Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia; Mrs. Sheila Page, Overseas Development Institute; and Mr. Goran P. Ohlin, Assistant Secretary-General, Office for Development Research and Policy Analysis, Department of International Economic and Social Affairs of the United Nations Secretariat.

The panelists for the afternoon meeting, which considered the environmental and humanitarian issues, were the following: Mrs. Sadako Ogata, United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees; Mr. Mostafa K. Tolba, Executive Director, United Nations Environment Programme; and Mr. Shukri Dajani, Assistant Director-General, International Labour Organisation.

Conclusion of the informal exchange of views

At the conclusion of the discussion, the President of the Council made the following statement:

An informal meeting such as we have held today could never suffice of itself to reveal the full extent of the economic, social and environmental consequences of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait and their short-, medium- and long-term impact. Still, this informal meeting, thanks to the excellent presentations by the panelists and statements by delegations, will have given us a better idea of the effects and influence of the Gulf conflict, both on the countries of the Gulf region and on the rest of the world.

The consequences of the conflict have given the concept of the interdependence of nations particular significance. The short-, medium- and long-term economic, social and environmental effects of the conflict are not limited to the countries of the region. The shock wave generated has been particularly keenly felt in the most vulnerable countries. Mrs. Sheila Page of the Overseas Development Institute, referring to the study carried out by her organization, said that the gross national product of more than 50 developing countries had declined by more than 1 per cent as a result of the Gulf conflict. If the short- and medium-term effects of the conflict can be gauged with some precision, the same is not true of the long-term consequences. It seems clear, in the light of the discussion just concluded, that the consequences of the conflict will be felt for a long time to come.

During the discussion, I identified some key points, which I would like to share with you.

(a) The Gulf conflict has caused and continues to cause considerable human suffering. Substantial material damage has been sustained. Reconstruction of the regions laid waste will take years of effort and will doubtless absorb substantial sums of money. Nevertheless, the cost of rebuilding Kuwait and Iraq now seems to be lower than was suggested at the end of the conflict.

(b) The effects of the conflict on the world economy appear overall to have been less destabilizing than was envisaged when the crisis arose.

(c) Nevertheless, the effects of the conflict on the economies of certain countries bound by strong commercial ties to the countries of the Gulf region have on occasion been significant: considerable losses have been incurred.

(d) The rise in oil prices during the second part of 1990, despite increased production by many oil-producing countries, seriously affected the economies of oil-importing and, in particular, developing countries. The rise aggravated the economic difficulties faced by the poorest countries, particularly in Africa, Asia and Latin America. In any event, this oil shock does not bear comparison with those that have affected the world economy in the past. I might add here that the meeting recently held in Paris at the beginning of July between oil producers and consumers seems to have been an important step in the right direction.

(e) The financial demands generated by the military operations and the financial resources required to rebuild the devastated regions are likely to increase the pressure on international savings and affect the availability of international financing. Such pressure will make the external debt crisis of the developing countries still harder to manage.

(f) The problem of dealing with the fallout from the crisis also seems likely to be aggravated by the drying-up of financial and technical assistance, which the countries affected by the conflict have traditionally given to certain developing countries. It is to be feared, moreover, that the selective nature of such assistance will become more pronounced in the future.

(g) The human costs of the conflict have been enormous. They must be measured in terms not only of the suffering inflicted on the peoples of the countries concerned but also of the outflows of refugees and displaced persons. The existing institutional machinery has been unable to cope with the scale of the needs generated by such a situation. In the light of this fact, a review of the capacity of the United Nations system to respond to humanitarian emergencies has begun.

(h) The losses to the economies of certain countries caused by the cut-off of funds repatriated by migrant workers have been considerable. The costs of repatriating and re-establishing migrant workers have increased these losses.

(i) The consequences of the Gulf conflict have also been felt in the tourism and service sectors.

(j) The international assistance mobilized to help the countries severely affected by the conflict has not followed traditional channels. It has not often been commensurate with the needs of the countries affected.

(k) The maintenance of the embargo against Iraq continues to penalize the economies of countries that used to have substantial economic relations with Iraq. The maintenance of the embargo is also severely affecting the population of Iraq. Mr. Antoine Blanca, Director-General for Development and International Economic Cooperation, referring to the survey carried out by Harvard University, and Mrs. Ogata both spoke of the imbalance between the massive mobilization in favour of the refugees in northern Iraq and the critical circumstances in which the remainder of the Iraqi population are living. This situation poses a serious threat of epidemics and widespread suffering.

(l) It is likely that the suffering of the people of the region will be exacerbated by the serious pollution and environmental degradation resulting from the conflict. The damage done to the environment during the conflict is enormous. Its effects on the environmental balance in the countries of the region and the rest of the world are hard to evaluate at this stage. It would be highly desirable for the United Nations system to be able to evaluate, precisely and scientifically, the environmental impact of the conflict. An institutional mechanism with the means of coping with environmental emergencies might be envisaged.

The points I have just mentioned are by no means exhaustive, given that the economic, social and ecological consequences of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait and their short-, medium- and long-term effects are difficult to gauge with any precision.

They do, however, require urgent mobilization on the part of the international community, not only to tackle the consequences of the situation but also to prevent the recurrence of such situations in future. The establishment of a global security system, in which the economic aspect will be of crucial importance, is an undertaking which the international community should embark on without delay. The creation of such a system, however, must be accompanied by the eradication of the underlying causes of the conflict.

Multilateral cooperation will, without question, have an important role to play in bringing this undertaking to fruition. I have no doubt that the United Nations will make its proper contribution to this endeavour. Regional cooperation will, I am sure, have a similar role.

SUMMING-UP BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL FOLLOWING THE INFORMAL EXCHANGE OF VIEWS ON THE STRENGTHENING OF MULTILATERAL COOPERATION IN INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

In concluding this informal exchange of views on the strengthening of multilateral economic cooperation in international economic affairs, I should like to thank Mr. Rafeeuddin Ahmed, Under-Secretary-General for International Economic and Social Affairs; Mr. Yves Berthelot, Deputy-Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development; Mr. Nitin Desai, Deputy Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development; Mr. Rhattan J. Bhatia, Director of the International Monetary Fund Office in the United Nations and Special Representative to the United Nations; and Mr. Peter Hansen, Executive Director of the United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations, for the outstanding contribution they have made, both individually and collectively, to this discussion. I should also like to thank all delegations for the attention with which they have followed this exchange of views and for their statements, comments and questions, which have enabled us to hold a discussion that has been frank, lively, thorough and, I am quite sure, beneficial for all of us.

This informal exchange of views has proved to be an extremely useful complement to the Council's general discussion of international economic and social policy, including regional and sectoral developments, which also focused on strengthening multilateral cooperation in international economic affairs. The informal framework has made it possible for the participants to initiate a dialogue based on the formal statements made previously in the Council's general discussion, which faithfully reflected the concerns and positions of all partners in multilateral cooperation.

Several points of convergence have become apparent during the general discussion and the informal exchange of views, which should stimulate further dialogue and serve as anchors for a renewal of multilateral cooperation. I have noted the following main points, which lie at the heart of the issue:

(a) The interdependence of economies, the globalization of markets and the emergence of new global challenges require an increased degree of international cooperation and coordination in such areas as environmental protection and action to combat drug-trafficking and AIDS;

(b) Questions of solidarity and equity must be considered in the face of such phenomena as the deepening North-South divide and natural disasters or other emergency situations;

(c) The mutual interests of North and South must be pursued, it being manifestly the case that growth in the countries of the North can have a beneficial effect on the developing countries and that the revival of growth in the countries of the South can increase North-South trade and, furthermore, create jobs in the countries of the North;

(d) The improvement in East-West relations can create a favourable climate for a renewal of multilateral cooperation and, more particularly, of the role of the United Nations system in promoting international cooperation for development.

Apart from the questions underlying the actual approach to multilateral cooperation, the institutional factors linked with dialogue and multilateral cooperation were highlighted in the discussion. The role of the United Nations and the United Nations system was emphasized, in its dual aspects as a framework for concentrated dialogue and negotiation, on the one hand, and its operational capacity, on the other. The discussion on the revitalization and restructuring of the economic and social machinery of the United Nations was placed in the context of an increased and more effective role in the service of development, and hence of peace and stability.

It was clear that concerns relating to resources and the desire for better coordination of activities remain at the forefront of attention, including better coordination and complementarity between the United Nations, the international financial institutions and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

Participants also recognized that the dynamization of multilateral cooperation also entails increased internal efforts by each of the developing countries to achieve optimum mobilization of its own resources, which will maximize the impact of contributions of external resources.

Strengthening the role of the non-traditional players in multilateral cooperation, notably non-governmental organizations, was identified as one of the future directions to be encouraged, as was popular participation within countries.

The potential for multilateral cooperation on environmental matters, which is considerable, was also widely discussed. In this connection, the risk of the diversion of resources from development activities to environmental protection activities, and even the risk of a new form of conditionality, was discussed.

International monetary and financial problems, in particular the external debt crisis of the developing countries, and the problems of mobilizing savings and foreign direct investment flows, were widely referred to as challenges to be met through a combination of internal policy measures and international measures requiring a multilateral approach. In this context, and in conjunction with the internationalization of financial markets and the role of transnational corporations, the challenges and difficulties involved in the coordination of the macroeconomic policies of the industrialized countries were referred to, together with their implications for the developing countries. This provides food for intensive multilateral thought on ways and means of taking into account the new factors that characterize international economic relations. Speakers unanimously recognized that, in the attainment of this objective, the United Nations, in particular the Economic and Social Council, can and must make a contribution.

The exercise in which we have just engaged falls clearly within the process of revitalization of the Economic and Social Council. By contributing to better mutual understanding between countries and groups of countries, this dialogue should help to lay firmer foundations for collective action capable of securing the approval and, what is more, the participation and active support of all the countries and organizations concerned.
