Statement submitted by the Global Foundation for Democracy and Development, a non-governmental organization in consultative status with the Economic and Social Council

The Secretary-General has received the following statement, which is being circulated in accordance with paragraphs 36 and 37 of Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/31.

Statement

Boosting local productivity, social cohesion and education opportunities on a local level as keys to poverty eradication and decent work for all

In today's globalized world, local economic stability is still essential for domestic consumer and investor confidence, which ultimately keeps the door open to larger corporations. In order to maintain a healthy environment where corporations and small businesses can be mutually beneficial, a careful balance must be struck. Recognizing that small businesses are a continuing source of dynamism for a nation's economy, the Global Foundation for Democracy and Development has led the call for a new approach to sustainable development: a local development paradigm. This model would strengthen local productivity and, by extension, the social fabric of the communities it affects. As always, the Foundation continues to offer reliable education and professional development while promoting programmes within the public and private sector that work toward social inclusion.

An integral part of the mission of the Foundation is to promote and support the economic and social development of the Dominican Republic. The Foundation's publications and research programmes therefore look to influence the development of public policy on these topics.

Current levels of unemployment (14.7 per cent as at 2012), foreign investment ($24.89 billion as at 31 December 2012) and trade balance trends have an appreciable effect on the growth of gross domestic product (GDP) and the involvement of the Dominican Republic in the global economy. Despite the fragility of the world economy, the country's GDP continues to rise by a growth rate of 5 per cent each year. Building on this steady growth, the Foundation advocates the considerable benefit in empowering small and medium-sized local businesses to increase production and exports, create jobs and work together with the public sector in developing and implementing educational and social programmes.

The Foundation therefore believes in the necessity of a paradigm change. It has become clear that the focus on GDP growth alone doesn't guarantee social integration and full employment. Speaking last July 2013, President Obama stressed that reducing the growing gap between rich and poor would constitute his highest priority during the remainder of his presidency, given that, although businesses were creating new jobs and had broken record profits, nearly all the income gains of the previous 10 years had continued to flow to the top 1 per cent. Research by the International Monetary Fund has shown that longer growth spells are robustly associated with more equality in income distribution. According to the organization, closing half the inequality gap between Latin America and emerging Asia would more than double the expected duration of a growth spell.

Within the Dominican Republic, the Government's recent national strategy for development highlights one of its main objectives as the creation of a unified society with equal opportunities and lower levels of poverty and social inequality. The Foundation makes this contribution to the debate by stating that it is vital to promote local businesses, through the support and empowerment of both existing and new local entrepreneurs. It is important to create policies that foster innovation, creativity and the incubation of new businesses. There are many positive examples within Latin America of initiatives dedicated to the support and creation of innovative enterprises that seeks to reduce income inequality and social disparity. It is these types of ventures that on a global level require a stronger support from the public sector and the international community.

A recent report by the World Economic Forum has shed light on the new department for social prosperity of the Government of Columbia, one of the structural government reforms that have helped in making the country a regional leader in narrowing the economic gap with the world's most efficient regulatory practices. Part of this initiative includes improving conditions for entrepreneurial development among its beneficiaries. In the light of this, it will soon be launching its private-public alliance strategy, including initiatives to increase impact investing and social enterprise.

The organization Lumni is a practical example of social enterprises influencing economic development across Latin America. The organization, which operates in four Latin American countries, is pioneering a novel financing instrument for low-income students called human capital contracts that both reduces risk for the student and offers the promise of expansive access because no collateral or co-signer is required. As part of this programme, Lumni finances students' educations and only asks them to pay back a fixed fraction of their income for a fixed number of months once they have a job, providing them with the best opportunity for gaining employment in the relevant national economy.

Taking stock of these successful initiatives, the Foundation believes that a similar local development paradigm is required that would seek to strengthen local productivity and communities social fabric, offer reliable education and professional development on a local level, and promote programmes within both the public and the private sector that work towards social inclusion.

Examples of local productivity and social inclusion and their positive impact on the Dominican Republic

In 2012, the Foundation developed a unique recycling scheme that offers workshops in art recycling to women, young people and children across the Dominican Republic. It demonstrates how recycling waste into art can empower individuals and communities alike. This programme seeks to raise awareness around environmental issues among Dominicans by promoting the three golden rules of proper waste management: reduce, reuse and recycle. Upon graduating from the workshops, the programme then equips individuals and their communities with the opportunity to launch their own ventures, turning this educational project into a source of income and entrepreneurship. As evidence of its success, the programme has launched more than 20 art workshops in four cities around the country, with many women having become certified to serve as multipliers of the programme, while helping to sustainably support their families.

Offer reliable education and professional development programmes

Education is another key part of the development paradigm. Through one of its programmes, the Foundation is supporting the creation of organic and sustainable vegetable gardens in schools and communities throughout the country. Travelling to small cities of the Dominican Republic such as San Cristobal, the Foundation has imparted induction workshops to other non-governmental organizations, introducing staff members to the programme and helping to define goals, regular duties and functional details for the creation of their community gardens. The series of workshops and sessions included in the programme educate members on how to create a vegetable garden, provide instruction on planting and general garden maintenance. Sessions also include seed conservation, pest control and organic fertilizers. To date, the programme has successfully created a total of 16 vegetable gardens in 12 schools (7 private and 5 public) and 4 community centres around the country. With the aim of developing this programme on a national scale, the Foundation is helping local families learn sustainable agriculture practices that can then be applied at home. This will enable them to not only supplement their diets, but to generate income for the community as well.

Promote programmes within both the public and the private sector that work towards social inclusion

The third and final part of this new development paradigm is the engagement with the private sector and its corporate social responsibility programmes to work towards social inclusion. The Foundation's work to raise awareness of the volunteer programme of the Dominican reserve bank is a good example of this. Established in 1941, the bank became renowned for its volunteer programme. It was recognized as the first Dominican financial institution to promote music, literature, education, sports and art in the Dominican Republic and is considered to be among the most committed projects of solidarity and social commitment in the country. The volunteer programme provides assistance to the needy in the areas of health care and, having expanded, is now raising awareness of environmental protection and corporate performance.

Conclusion

The education and engagement of local communities, together with the development of local economies, clearly constitutes a vital development paradigm for ensuring the promotion of sustainable development in both developed and developing countries across the world. However, as can be seen from the actions of the Foundation, this transition will only be effective if it is supported at both the national and the local levels by each relevant stakeholder in both the public and the private sectors.

The Foundation hopes that this statement will help provide further guidance to the attendees of the fifty-second session of the Commission for Social Development.
