Summary

The forty-eighth session of the Commission on Population and Development was held at United Nations Headquarters on 11 April 2014 and from 13 to 17 April 2015. Its special theme was “Realizing the future we want: integrating population issues into sustainable development, including in the post-2015 development agenda”.

The Commission considered the report of the Bureau of the Commission on Population and Development on its intersessional meetings (E/CN.9/2015/2), which detailed the work of the Bureau in organizing the session.

The Commission considered three reports of the Secretary-General on the special theme of the session. The first, the report of the Secretary-General on integrating population issues into sustainable development, including in the post-2015 development agenda (E/CN.9/2015/3), provides an overview of the demographic changes that are projected to occur over the next 15 years and discusses their implications for efforts to achieve sustainable development. The report shows that the greatest and most fundamental challenge is to adjust to a world population of 8.4 billion people eager to achieve higher standards of living, while minimizing the negative impact of human activity on the environment. With the exception of Europe, where the total population is projected to decrease slightly, all other major regions are projected to grow by at least 10 per cent over the next 15 years. The fastest population growth is projected to occur in low- and lower-income countries, making it harder for governments in those countries to eradicate poverty and inequality, combat hunger and malnutrition, strengthen the coverage and quality of education and health systems, and improve access to basic services. While the population in low- and lower-middle-income countries is projected to grow, the population of 29 countries, 21 of which are located in Europe, is expected to decline. Below-replacement fertility, sometimes combined with emigration, will result in rapid growth of the proportion of persons over age 60, raising concerns about the fiscal sustainability of existing social protection programmes.

The report of the Secretary-General also identifies specific population trends over the next 15 years that present particular challenges for Member States and the international community. For example, it is projected that an additional 2.1 billion babies will be born worldwide, with the majority being born in Africa and Asia. An increasing number of births poses particular challenges for low-income countries, where rates of poverty and malnutrition are already high, levels of education are low, health-care systems are weak and rates of infant and child mortality are high. In addition, about 2 billion children are projected to reach school age, and about 1.9 billion young people will turn 15 years old. Although substantial progress has been made towards universal primary education over the past 15 years, efforts must be scaled up just to maintain current levels of school enrolment. In addition, the number of women of reproductive age is projected to increase in all areas of the world, except in Europe. The report emphasizes that achieving gender equality and the empowerment of women will require eliminating all forms of violence and discrimination against women, promoting female education, and ensuring that women have access to safe and effective means of family planning, as well as ensuring women's equal access to the labour market, social security and political process.

The report also highlights that older persons, aged 60 or over, are now the world's fastest growing age group and will make up an increasing proportion of the global population. In addition, all of the projected 1.1 billion increase in global population over the next 15 years will take place in urban areas. Responding to rapid urban growth presents an important opportunity to implement an ambitious urban development agenda that will make cities and human settlements inclusive, safe, resilient and sustainable. Furthermore, the number of international migrants is projected to increase in the next 15 years, possibly adding an additional 15 million people if current trends continue. To ensure the well-being of all migrants and to harness the full development potential of migration, sufficient legal channels for safe and orderly migration need to be created.

In conclusion, the report stresses that the further implementation of the Programme of Action, as well as the achievement of the sustainable development goals, will depend on forging new and stronger partnerships with the active engagement of governments, civil society, the private sector and the United Nations system. Strengthening evidence- and rights-based development strategies, programmes and policies depends on the availability of reliable, robust, accessible and timely population data and analysis. As the world embarks on the post-2015 development agenda, there is an urgent need to strengthen the evidence base in order to monitor progress, hold governments accountable and foster sustainable development.

The second report of the Secretary-General addresses the monitoring of population programmes, focusing on integrating population issues into sustainable development, including in the post-2015 development agenda (E/CN.9/2015/4) and highlights the experiences of Member States in addressing population issues that are central to defining and implementing a post-2015 vision for sustainable development. In particular, the report focuses on mobility and urbanization of populations; the time-bound opportunity to enable demographic dividends; the centrality of sexual and reproductive health and rights for sustainable development; and the potential for reaping returns on population data.

The third report of the Secretary-General addresses the flow of financial resources for assisting in the implementation of the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development (E/CN.9/2015/5). Despite modest increases in donor assistance, current funding levels are below the amounts necessary to fully implement the Programme of Action. As the international community charts a course for the post-2015 era, population dynamics and reproductive health are central to sustainable development and must be an integral part of development planning and poverty reduction strategies. In the report, the Secretary-General points out that the success of the post-2015 development agenda will require increased efforts to mobilize the financial resources necessary to address the unfinished work of the International Conference on Population and Development.

The Commission also reviewed the report of the Secretary-General entitled “Programme implementation and progress of work in the field of population in 2014: Population Division, Department of Economic and Social Affairs” (E/CN.9/2015/6), and took note of the draft programme of work of the Division for the biennium 2016-2017 (E/CN.9/2015/CRP.1). The report of the Secretary-General on programme implementation and progress of work in the field of population in 2014 covers the activities of the Population Division in the areas of fertility and mortality analysis, population policies and international migration. It also discusses the preparation of the world population estimates and projections and the work conducted on the links between population and development. It covers the Division’s substantive servicing of intergovernmental bodies, the preparation of parliamentary documentation and technical publications, the organization of expert group meetings, dissemination of results and capacity-development and technical cooperation. The objective of the subprogramme on population is to strengthen the international community's capacity to effectively address current and emerging population issues and to integrate the population dimension into the international development agenda. The Commission on Population and Development provides the subprogramme with intergovernmental guidance.

The Commission heard a keynote address on the theme "Population dynamics and sustainable development" delivered by Tim Dyson, Professor of Population Studies in the Department of International Development at the London School of Economics. The Commission also heard a keynote address on the theme "Reproductive health, gender and sustainable development" by Suzana Cavenaghi, Professor, National School of Statistical Science, Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics. The session was moderated by Lakshmi Puri, Assistant Secretary-General of the United Nations and Deputy Executive Director of the United Nations Entity for Gender Equality and the Empowerment of Women (UN-Women), who also gave introductory remarks on the importance of sexual and reproductive health and rights in the context of sustainable development.

The Commission also held an interactive panel discussion on the theme "Integrating population issues into sustainable development", moderated by Pamela Falk, United Nations Resident Correspondent and Foreign Affairs Analyst, CBS News Television and Radio. The following panellists participated in the discussion: Lori Hunter, Professor, Sociology and Environment and Society Program, University of Colorado at Boulder; Jacob R. S. Malungu, Professor of Demography, University of Zambia; Mark Montgomery, Senior Associate, Population Council and Professor, Stony Brook University; and Gita Sen, Professor of Public Health, Indian Institute of Management, Bangalore.

The Commission heard a statement by the Vice-President of the Economic and Social Council on the contribution of population and development issues to the theme of the annual ministerial review in 2015. The Vice-President noted that population issues were directly relevant to the current year's discussions in the high-level segment of the Council, including the high-level political forum. He urged delegations to take into account in their deliberations the conclusions of the integration segment of the Council on employment and decent work for all.

The Commission decided that the theme of its forty-ninth session, to be held in 2016, would be "Strengthening the demographic evidence base for the post-2015 development agenda" and that the theme for the fiftieth session, to be held in 2017, would be decided in 2016 to align better with the theme of the Economic and Social Council for 2017 and topics emanating from the post-2015 development agenda, to be decided in the fall of 2015.

The Commission also decided to review its methods of work during the forty-ninth session in 2016 and asked the Secretariat, in consultation with Member States and the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA), to draft a note for consideration by the Commission on ways and means to further enhance the impact of the work of the Commission and its contribution to the Economic and Social Council.

The Commission approved the provisional agenda for its forty-ninth session and adopted the report on its forty-eighth session.

Chair's summary of the discussions on the proposed outcome document on integrating population issues into sustainable development, including the post-2015 development agenda

Delegations at the forty-eighth session of the Commission on Population and Development undertook extensive negotiations on a wide range of issues related to the special theme of the Commission, namely, integrating population issues into sustainable development, including in the post-2015 development agenda. The negotiations were carried out on the basis of a draft resolution which was released by the Chair on 17 March 2015. Negotiations on the document started on Tuesday, 7 April, and concluded on Friday, 17 April, the last day of the session. In order to foster a convergence of views, the facilitator produced, throughout the discussions, successive compromise texts which served as the basis for further negotiations. The negotiations were carried out in full transparency and their timing and format allowed all interested delegations to participate. Delegations were informed that, failing to achieve a negotiated result, the Chair would submit a Chair's text for agreement. The negotiations produced very broad areas of agreement but also revealed persistent divergences on a small number of contentious issues, as illustrated below. As a consequence, the Chair presented a compromise text intended to bridge the remaining gaps. Given the statement by one regional group that that text was not acceptable, the Chair's text was consequently withdrawn. The Commission then decided that the Chair would submit a summary of the discussion on the draft resolution to be included in the report of the Commission to the Economic and Social Council. At the next session, reflection on the methods of work would offer an opportunity to examine ways to avoid the repetition of such stalemates, in order to improve the efficiency of the work of the Commission.

Through the discussions, there was broad agreement that the implementation of the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development was essential for the unfinished work of completing the Millennium Development Goals and of fundamental importance to a post-2015 development agenda centred on people and the planet. Delegations shared many very similar perspectives on matters related to population and sustainable development and reached full agreement on many priority areas for advancing the Programme of Action. It was well recognized that people were at the centre of sustainable development and that millions of people, especially women and children, had been left behind in the unfinished work of the Millennium Development Goals, and that the vision of the post-2015 development agenda was to strive for a world that was just, equitable and inclusive. In addition, many countries stressed the importance of respecting, protecting and promoting human rights, particularly the human rights of women and girls, which was seen as essential for sustained individual well-being, inclusive economic growth, the reduction of inequalities and the achievement of the post-2015 development agenda. Similarly, many countries stressed that gender equality and the empowerment of women could not be achieved without promoting and protecting the rights of women to enjoy all human rights and fundamental freedoms, including their reproductive rights, and that sustainable development and the goals of the post-2015 development agenda could not be fully achieved without the participation of all women and girls as agents and drivers of change.

During the negotiations, many delegations pointed to the existing body of declarations that provided the background and framework for decision-making on the current thematic topic. These included: the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the obligations of States parties to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, the Convention on the Rights of the Child, the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families, as well as the outcomes of relevant United Nations high-level meetings, conferences and summits, including the United Nations Millennium Declaration, the 2005 World Summit Outcome, the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action and the five-year review of the implementation of the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action, the World Programme of Action for Youth, and the outcome document of the high-level meeting of the General Assembly on youth: dialogue and mutual understanding, the Madrid International Plan of Action on Ageing, 2002, the Political Declaration on HIV and AIDS: Intensifying Our Efforts to Eliminate HIV and AIDS, and the Political Declaration of the High-level Meeting of the General Assembly on the Prevention and Control of Non-communicable Diseases, as well as the outcome document of the high-level plenary meeting of the General Assembly on the Millennium Development Goals, the outcome document of the United Nations Conference on Sustainable Development, held in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, from 20 to 22 June 2012, entitled “The future we want”, the outcome document of the high-level meeting of the General Assembly on the realization of the Millennium Development Goals and other internationally agreed development goals for persons with disabilities: “The way forward: a disability-inclusive development agenda towards 2015 and beyond”, and the Declaration of the 2013 High-level Dialogue on International Migration and Development. One area of disagreement, however, was the reference to outcomes of the regional conferences for the implementation of the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development.

During the proceedings, delegations acknowledged that demographic trends were posing challenges as well as providing opportunities for the achievement of the post-2015 development agenda. Countries experiencing continued rapid population growth were confronted with additional demand when trying to address poverty reduction, deliver basic services and ensure that no one was left behind. Many of those countries were among the poorest in the world, which, in any case, would be struggling to implement the new development agenda. At the same time, young people in all countries were a major resource for development and a potential catalyst for social change, economic development and technological innovation. Greater investments in young people in order to equip them with the skills they needed, as well as to provide them with opportunities to participate in all levels of decision-making, were essential for further economic and social development. In addition, fertility declines produced shifts in a population’s age structure, producing a situation whereby a temporarily greater proportion of the population was in the prime working-ages. Under the right economic environment, that demographic dividend could temporarily accelerate per capita economic growth.

Delegations also recognized that demographic challenges were not only related to population increase. Countries that had reached population stability, or in some cases were experiencing population decline, were increasingly confronted with the needs and concerns of older people. It was noted that between 2015 and 2030 the increase in the number of older people would be greatest and most rapid in the developing world. In addition, non-communicable diseases accounted for an increasing share of the overall disease burden. The global burden and threat of non-communicable diseases undermined social and economic development throughout the world, threatening development. Delegations agreed, but also noted the importance of continuing to scale up the efforts in the fight against communicable diseases, in particular HIV/AIDS.

The issue of sexual and reproductive health and rights was again one of the most contentious in the Commission on Population and Development, although the importance of access to reproductive health, as well as of reproductive rights, was broadly recognized. For a number of countries, sexual and reproductive health and rights were key to achieve the aims of the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development, as they were essential for the full realization of all human rights, as well as for ending discrimination and eliminating harmful practices. In line with this, it was also important to promote comprehensive sexuality education. Other countries, however, did not consider sexual and reproductive health and rights an internationally agreed concept. They stressed that they could not accept a resolution that ran counter to their national laws, and reiterated the importance of including references to national sovereignty. They also stressed that sexuality education and related matters should be considered within the national context, including cultural values and religious beliefs.

Issues relating to the concept of family and the role of families remained another area of disagreement.

The need to put an end to child and forced marriage was broadly endorsed. However, some delegations voiced a concern about the lack of an agreed definition of early marriage. Others pointed to already agreed resolutions referring clearly to child, early and forced marriage.

The Commission also discussed the importance of strengthening policies to make cities and human settlements inclusive, affordable, safe, accessible, resilient and sustainable and called for proactive participatory planning to harness the potential benefits of high population density in urban areas, notably through supporting infrastructure development, fostering innovation and utilizing more energy-efficient technologies in transportation and housing.

The important and complex relationship between migration, development and population issues was also brought forward. The need to address the challenges and opportunities of migration was recognized, through international, regional or bilateral cooperation and dialogue and through a comprehensive and balanced approach that recognized the roles and responsibilities of countries of origin, transit and destination in promoting and protecting the human rights of all migrants and avoiding approaches that might aggravate their vulnerability.

There was a clear link between population, development levels and consumption patterns. There was broad agreement in the Commission that reducing and eliminating unsustainable patterns of production and consumption and promoting appropriate policies, including population-related policies that respected human rights, were necessary in order to meet the needs of the current generation without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs.

Many countries emphasized that population and development issues were interlinked with sustainable development at the subnational, national and international levels, requiring a multi-stakeholder and international approach. They also stressed the importance of integrating population dynamics into development planning and acknowledged the need to strengthen statistical systems in order to monitor better the progress towards the implementation of the Programme of Action, the key actions for its further implementation, and the post-2015 development agenda at the regional, national and local levels.

Delegations recognized that the Programme of Action required the mobilization of new and additional resources at the national and international levels, as well as new and additional resources for developing countries from all available funding mechanisms, including multilateral, bilateral and private sources, and that Governments were not expected to meet the goals and objectives of the Programme of Action single-handedly.

Delegations also expressed support for the efforts of the United Nations Population Fund to continue to assist countries to achieve the full implementation of the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development and for the Secretary-General to continue his substantive work on population issues, including on the interactions between population dynamics, inequalities and the achievement of the internationally agreed development goals, including the sustainable development goals and the post-2015 development agenda.

Chapter II

UN-Women, who also made introductory remarks on the importance of sexual and reproductive health and rights in the context of sustainable development. Ms. Cavenaghi argued for the continuation of the agenda of the International Conference on Population and Development and underscored that it should not be reduced to the subset of topics that would be included in the sustainable development goals and targets. She emphasized the need for the international community to invest in the data revolution, especially in the light of the post-2015 development agenda. Representatives of Brazil, Chad, Nigeria and Zambia and the observer for Cuba participated in the interactive debate following the keynote presentation.
